U. S. Navy's 'New' Uniform Brings Back An Old Favorite

Leisure suits with flared trousers, worn with open-necked shirts, became the fashion a couple of years ago.

That was the same time that the U. S. Navy discarded bell-bottomed trousers and open-necked jumpers for a coat-and-tie outfit whose trouser legs were narrow and straight.

Now, men's styles are again playing up suits with cuffed, straight-leg trousers, and shorts with neckties. So what is the Navy doing? It's going back to wide-bottomed trousers and V-neck jumpers.

Not Out of Step

It sounds as if the Navy deliberately is being contrary. Actually, the navy brass is just bowing to popular demand - shipboard constraints.

When the suit-jacketed uniform was proposed a few years ago, many enlisted men favored it. Once it became standard issue, however, its glamor quickly wore thin.

Sailors discovered that their salty, sea rover image vanished as soon as they donned coats and ties, just like shorebound males.

They also found that the new togs required too much space aboard ship, and took a lot of effort to keep in shape. Crowded crew's quarters had to accommodate lockers with hangers and drawers filled with laundered and ironed shirts, as well as pants-pressing machines.

The old uniform, on the other hand, kept its nautical nattiness with a minimum of care, the National Geographic Society points out. It also is easier to stow, leaving more space for those traditional, clandestine poker games below decks.

A bucket of water, some soap, and a scrubbing brush are all that is needed to clean bell bottoms and a jumper - along with a toothbrush to scrub the stripes on collar and cuffs.

"No-iron" Clothing

Long before permanent press fabrics were thought of, a seaman's clothes needed little or no ironing.

After being hung up to dry inside out, the uniform could be folded neatly along its seams and tightly rolled into a compact cylinder that took little space in seabag or locker.

Unrolled and reversed, the outfit appeared neatly pressed, even distinctive. For the finicky, a suit of dress blues could be "sack pressed" by folding it neatly beneath the wearer's bunk mattress and sleeping on it for a couple of nights.

For sailors who preferred to iron their gear, the old bell bottoms needed only a light touch with an iron, something that could be handled at sea in anything short of a full gale.

Now bell bottoms are coming back, their only concession to modernity being that lighter weight, permanent press blends may replace the all-wool of earlier eras.

In this age of computers and technicians, the "new" bell bottoms might recreate a little of the old romance of the sea, allowing even radar operators at shore stations to legitimately adopt a rolling gait.

Miss Blankenship Completes Duke Medical Program

Miss Catherine Blankenship, daughter of Mrs. Nancy Blankenship of Warrenton, completed the Operating Room Technology Program of the Duke University Medical Center in graduation exercises on Friday, September 9. The graduation was held at 7:30 p. m. in the first floor amphitheater of the Medical Center.

Miss Carolina Bonjoc, R. N., instructor of the 1977 OR Technology Class, welcomed the guests and introduced the seven students. Miss Rebecca Owins, R. N., Director of the Operating Rooms, and George Brandon, Administrator, said a few words.

Dr. H. F. Swiger, professor of General Surgery and associate professor of Immunology was the guest speaker. Diplomas and pins were presented to the students by Miss Bonjoc and a farewell speech was given by Miss Blankenship.

Miss Blankenship was one of seven students accepted into the one-year technology program. The students were taught courses in anatomy, physiology, microbiology, sterilization, principles of aseptic technique, operating room technique, and surgical procedures.

In addition to classwork, the students did three-week rotations through the eight surgical services: General, Orthopedics, Gynecology, Urology, Ophthalmology, Otolaryngology, Thoracic, and Neurosurgery.

After completion of these rotations, the students spent three months in an advanced clinical rotation.

Following completion of the program, Miss Blankenship will remain at Duke Medical Center as a General Thoracic OR Technician on a part-time basis.

She has enrolled at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill this fall. She is a member of Chapter 95, East Tar Heel Chapter of the Association of Operating Room Technicians.

Used Refrigerator Sought By Center

Those passing by the Warren County Child Development Center, housed in All Saints Episcopal Church, may think old Jack Frost has already arrived. The problem, however, is the refrigerator. It has to be defrosted every day.

The Center feeds lunch to the students and must have a good refrigerator to properly store the food.

A new refrigerator is needed. If anyone is able to donate a refrigerator to the center, call Faith Becker at 257-1019.

Enters College

Marietta E. Williams, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Williams of Warrenton, is entering her freshman year at Cheney State College in Philadelphia, Pa. Planning to major in early childhood education, she is a 1977 graduate of John Graham Senior High School.
