Geologists say another major eruption of Mount St. Helens is unlikely but smaller explosions may continue for decades. Before 1980, Mount St. Helens last came to life in 1831 and spattered intermittently for 25 years.

Pick Garden Vegetables At Proper Time

Growing your home garden vegetables properly is only half the game. You've got to pick them right, too.

Take lima beans, for example. North Carolina State University extension horticulturists point out that limas that stay on the bush too long are likely to be less tasty and flavorful. They probably will have a starchy taste.

Picking too early is wasteful, so look for a happy medium.

A good way to tell when the bean is ready to pick is the change in color. Green seeded types of limas turn white as they become over-mature. Speckled seeded types develop specks or blotches as the green color fades.

Picking snap beans at the right time is important, too. Pick these when pods are fully developed but when seeds are no more than 50 percent of their normal size. If you let them stay on the bush too long, you'll have beans with too much fiber.

gardening know-how is picking sweet corn at just the proper time. Experience is the only thing that will make you an expert.

It's a shame to waste yield by picking the ears when they are grossly immature. On the other hand, corn left on the stalk for too long isn't good for much but feeding the livestock. If it is only slightly beyond maturity, there is some reduction in quality but the volume is much greater.

If you're inexperienced, there is only one solution: trial and error. But don't pull back the shuck on the tips of too many ears. Exposed kernels attract insects, and they can destroy the ear in short order.

Pulling tomatoes isn't so critical. You can pretty well see what you're getting when you take them from the vine. If you're canning the tomatoes, pick them fully, red ripe but not mushy.
