Lawmaker Concerned By Reagan Omission

By REP. L. H. FOUNTAIN

WASHINGTON, D. C. — In his State of the Union address, President Reagan outlined issues of vital importance to the nation which must be carefully addressed by the 97th Congress.

Among them: national defense, the control of government waste and abuse, and the fundamental question of the proper course of American federalism — that is to say, which level of government is best equipped to deal with those matters which demand and must have responsible governmental involvement.

However, I was disappointed that the President did not address the problem of budget deficits in a more substantial manner. With the possibility of a budget deficit in excess of $100 billion, the issue is now more important than ever. Budget deficits contribute to inflationary pressures and reduce private capital formation — just the opposite of what we need at this time.

Furthermore, large budget deficits make it difficult to foresee any relief from high interest rates; adversely affecting such important segments of the economy as construction, housing and the auto industry. Ultimately, that means fewer jobs for unemployed Americans who desperately want to work.

In general, the president's proposals to reduce the rate of increase in federal spending appear to have been responsible. If we continue to spend more money than we take in, America will soon be bankrupt.

There have been, however, recent administration-inspired cuts which may run counter to the best interests of the economy in view of the serious national unemployment situation, now at 9,462,000. Funds used by the states to run employment services, for example, were cut twice; the first cut was $150 million and the second, $263 million.

These cuts have adversely affected the North Carolina Employment Security Commission — and all other state employment services across the nation. The second cut came about recently when the president threatened to close down the government if a whole round of additional budget cuts was not adopted.

Many people feel it is extremely shortsighted to cut back drastically on the national effort to help people find jobs — especially during a recession like we're in now. Let's hope counterproductive budget cuts like this can be avoided in the future.

The president's statement on our national defense and foreign policy was sound. Clearly, we must remain strong — second to none — and negotiate from a position of strength, not weakness.

The president was also on target with his renewed commitment to fight government waste, fraud, and abuse. As the president said, the Inspectors General — in place through legislation I introduced — uncovered about $2 billion in waste and fraud during a recent six month period. And that's a step forward.

Earlier in this administration, it was unclear whether he would strongly support the still-new Inspectors General. But, I emphasized to the president the importance of this battle, and we are now well on the way to curbing abuse and saving taxpayers' dollars.

Finally, the president has proposed sweeping changes in the operation of our federal system. He relied heavily on comprehensive studies of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations on how to make government more responsible and responsive. While agreeing with ACIR's diagnosis, the president's proposed solutions — admittedly not set in concrete — are much more sweeping than ACIR's recommendations.

In any event, without forgetting our serious economic plight, I hope national attention will now focus on this vital issue, leading to a stronger nation in years to come, and doing so without inequitably placing an excessive burden on the backs of state and local government.

As has been said before, the president proposes and the Congress disposes. Hopefully, both will work fruitfully together toward responsible solutions.

I SAID A PRAYER FOR YOU TODAY

I said a prayer for you today
And know God must have heard—
I felt the answer in my heart
Although He spoke no word!
I didn't ask for wealth or fame
(I knew you wouldn't mind)—
I asked Him to send treasures
Of a far more lasting kind!
I asked that He'd be near you
At the start of each new day
To grant you health and blessings
And friends to share your way!
I asked for happiness for you
In all things great and small —
But it was for His loving care
I prayed for most of all!

Mr. Dailes, a retired farmer, died Saturday at Duke Medical Center in Durham following a brief illness.

He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Janet Dailes of the home; one daughter, Mrs. Yearnette Yellock of the home; five sons, Charlie Dailes of Baltimore, Md., James Thomas Dailes of Philadelphia, Pa., Robert Dailes of New York, Earl Dailes of Middleburg and Willie Dailes of the home; one sister, Mrs. Mary V. Bullock of Warrenton; and ten grandchildren.

Recognize Elders

In Public, Private

"Everyone has a need to be recognized, to feel that he counts on this earth, that he has value and is important," says Isabelle Buckley, extension aging specialist at North Carolina State University. "People who lead active, busy lives get the recognition they require naturally from what they do in their jobs, in their family relationships and in their community activities," she adds.

But it is much more difficult to obtain these satisfactions if you are confined to home or bed or can no longer participate as actively in life as you once did.

This is a problem for many North Carolina senior citizens, the specialist says, and she suggests that they merit both private and public recognition.

Private recognition means respect and acceptance from friends and family.

Use respectful terms of address, Miss Buckley suggests, to let the older person know you still recognize his dignity.

If an older person lives in a home for elders, be sure his private life is respected.

Even though he may have known his roommates for years, personal discussions should still be kept private.

"When people discuss their affairs in front of others who have no reason to hear, they have a part of themselves taken away," Miss Buckley warns.

Another simple way to recognize old people is to have respect for their concerns, anxieties and fears.

"This acceptance increases their confidence in you and gives them strength to deal with their own problems," the specialist notes.

Another private form of recognition is respect for the treasured possessions of the elderly. Sometimes they are all the individual has salvaged from an entire life.

There are more public forms today, too, for recognizing the retired person. Organizations like the American Association of Retired Persons have focused attention on active retirees.

And actual awards are available for achievements of senior-age people, Miss Buckley says.

One in particular, the Second Wind Award, inducts people into the "Second Wind Hall of Fame," of Hendersonville, N. C. Second Wind actively seeks seniors "who continue life with zest and imagination."

Miss Buckley says the efforts of such groups are important for bringing needed recognition to senior citizens whose contributions continued long after retirement.
