

Patrol Asking Parents To Use Restraining Seats

With the Child Passenger Safety Law to become effective July 1, the State Highway Patrol is encouraging parents to voluntarily comply by placing their children in approved child safety seats when driving.

The law, enacted by the 1981 General Assembly, requires children under two years of age to be in an approved child passenger restraint system when riding with their parent in the family vehicle.

According to Jenkins, the failure of parents to place their child in a restraint system may be a tragic mistake. In case of a crash, a mother weighing only 100 pounds with a child in her lap will add 2,000 pounds of force to the baby's impact with the dashboard. He also pointed out that unrestrained children are often hurt or killed in sudden stops or falls out of windows and doors and cause over 200 accidents a year in North Carolina by distracting drivers.

"Each year, hundreds of North Carolina children are seriously injured or killed in auto crashes. I am confident that with parents voluntarily complying with this new law by securing their children in a child safety seat every time they ride in the family vehicle, many young lives will be saved," Jenkins concluded.

Time And Talent Can Be Used To Equal Dollars

Many North Carolina families have found in recent years that time and talent can be substituted for money to stretch income.

"This can be done by making goods and performing services at home instead of buying them when it is economical to do so," explains Dr. Thelma Hinson, family resource management specialist at North Carolina State University.

According to studies, the value of goods and services produced in the home averages 50 percent of after-tax income. Thus it enables people to enjoy a much higher level of living than that achieved by buying everything in the marketplace.

Worthwhile activities for home production depend on one's interest, time and talent, says Dr. Hinson.

Ideas to consider include: all types of gifts for personal, household and recreational uses; household repairs and remodeling; sewing and mending; and food production, conservation and preparation.

"Be cautious," Dr. Hinson warns. "Select only those types of activities for home production which are appropriate for the skills, interests, and needs of self or family. Activities which are too difficult or time consuming to finish will only be a waste of money and effort."

To be productive, home activities must yield profits in satisfaction, money saved or usefulness. Home activities which yield only satisfaction can be psychologically, but not economically productive.

To be economically productive, the home activity must eliminate the need to purchase a good or service, produce it at lower cost or yield a savings great enough to justify the investment of time, effort and money.
