Select Plants That Will Fit Architecture

The homeowner who takes pains to make the proper selection of plants for the home landscape will be the most satisfied when the job is completed. Buying plants without a plan often will lead to disappointment.

Agricultural extension specialists at North Carolina State University suggest that the plants you choose should fit the architecture of the home. The plants should accent the style of the house and not detract from it. For example, boxwood is excellent with colonial or antebellum home styles but may not be right for more modern styles.

Why do boxwoods go well with colonial style homes today? Very simply put, it is because boxwood was the shrub of choice in many attractive home landscapes during the colonial period of the nation's history.

If your home is modern or contemporary, the yucca may be much more appropriate than boxwood, for example. But the yucca would be out of place around an older style.

The right shrub will emphasize the good lines of the building. Most modern houses have a "good" line where the house meets the ground. This shouldn't be completely hidden by shrubs. There should be areas where the house shows at the ground line.

older house that is elevated and not underpinned will need a mass of shrubs to conceal or hide the base. Here, the shrubs become almost a screen, although they shouldn't take on the appearance of a hedge around the foundation.

All evergreens are often preferred in the front of the house, while a combination of evergreens and deciduous plants may do well along side walls and across the back. No shrubs should be allowed to grow over windows. Use low-growing or slow-growing plants under windows.

Using specimen shrubs away from the house out in the front yard usually isn't a good practice. Trees are better choices there, with shrubs around the foundation. However, landscaping is closely related to interior decorating. Personal preference prevails.

Ceramic tile can be installed by the do-it-yourselfer, but it requires an absolutely smooth surface for proper adhesion.
