Navies Need Not Fear The Aeroplane.

By Rear Admiral WILLIAM T. SWINBURNE, U. S. N., Retired.

THE AEROPLANE IN ITS PRESENT STATE OF DEVELOPMENT IS NOT TO BE FEARED BY THE NAVIES OF THE WORLD. THE AEROPLANE MUST ATTAIN TO A STATE OF PROGRESS ABOUT FIVE THOUSAND TIMES WHAT IT HAS NOW BEFORE IT CAN FIGURE AGAINST THE NAVIES.

A navy is not to defend harbors. It is to destroy other navies or proceed against harbor fortifications, which latter it can do at a distance of twenty or thirty miles, which is TOO FAR OUT FOR THE AEROPLANE TO GO on an important mission.

Again, the aeroplane, if it wants to drop bombs on a warship, must go to TOO GREAT A HEIGHT to try the feat, for otherwise it can easily be reached by the marksmen of the warship. Getting to a height great enough to try business, she will find her bombs deflected by air currents.

When I was on the Texas we had a number of gunners who could easily pick out any aeroplane at the height at which the aeroplanes can do mischief.
