but The Wizard of Oz is giving Alice close competition in my mind. It is just as fantastic, just as well staged; claims to be written for children, but has passages only adults can fully enjoy. The best part is where the Wizard bestows awards upon the scarecrow, who had so long wanted a brain; the tin man who longed for a heart; and the cowardly lion who yearned to be brave. The scarecrow got a diploma, because if only you have a diploma, it makes no difference if you have no brain at all; the tin man got a testimonial, because it is not how many you love, but how many love you that counts in this world; the lion got a medal for bravery because no one questions the owner of a medal about what he did to deserve it.

But they all helped the little girl in the story and that in turn helped each of them to at least partially overcome his lack.
