"IT'S A FREE COUNTRY; I'LL SAY WHAT I PLEASE!"

The best freedom for all is that which denies as well as grants. My rights are always circumscribed by those of others in the things I say. Even if they are not, they are permissible only so far as their rightness and helpfulness extend. Just now we hear a great deal about the freedom we are fighting for—a freedom not for ourselves alone but for mankind everywhere.

A fundamental matter in America is freedom of speech, spoken and written. It plays a tremendous part in the morale of fighting for the greater freedom. Many of us believe the Constitution grants us the right to say what we please, anywhere, any time. It is a much-abused birthright.

The average man, the soap box orator, the Fifth Column promoter, the town gossip, the statesman, the preacher—all enjoy freedom of speech. So does the printer and publisher where opportunity and responsibility are multiplied and magnified through the printed page.

But free speech gives no one the right to slander the innocent, discourage the patriot, obstruct justice, or impede progress in any humanitarian undertaking. If the Constitution gives broad rights to discuss human affairs, it also narrows them down to only such as are constructive and righteous and beneficial to society as a whole.

The right of freedom of speech is in these troublous times a frightening responsibility. It is a job for the conscience. A whisper or a shout may be as dangerous as the eGstapo. While conserving, we may well conserve some of our criticism of matters of local concern, those who are leading in religious and moral interests, those at the head of government affairs, and the conduct of the war itself. All these and many other things just now need "the good word."

Let us remember that free speech denies us the right to say some things just as much as it allows us to say others. Free speech is a heritage and right too precious and important just now to be lightly used, abused, or regarded.
