

Fresh Air Is Needed

Since poults need more ventilation during hot weather than they do during the cooler spring season, turkey producers should make certain that enough fresh air is provided for their young birds, advises Lee W. Herrick, Jr., Extension turkey specialist at State College.

This point is particularly important because many of the older poults are still in brooder houses and many more June poults are being started this year than last, Mr. Herrick said.

The "nose test" will generally reveal whether more fresh air is needed, the specialist said. When the air in the brooder house smells clean and fresh, there is ample ventilation; but when an odor is noticed, more ventilation is needed. If the odor is strong, the need for fresh air is very great.

Mr. Herrick said all the space between the plate over the sadding in front of the house and the roof should be open, especially after the poults are several weeks old. As the young turkeys grow older and the weather gets warmer, more windows should be opened as indicated by results of the "nose test."

After the poults are four to six weeks old, it is well to have openings on all sides of the brooder house. The openings may be made by removing the windows on the front and sides. Openings may be made in the back of the house by removing two boards all along the back, putting them on cleats and hinges so they may be swung open when more air is needed.

Some growers using 10 by 12 foot portable brooder houses on skids have each side on hinges so the whole side can be opened to provide a "fresh air" shelter when the poults become older. These are sometimes moved to the range and serve as range shelters also.

Outstanding Woman

Mrs. C. P. Mitchell of Elizabeth City, the former Lucia Flowers of Zebulon, was voted the year's most outstanding club woman, of that city, at a luncheon at the Virginia Dare Hotel.

Following the luncheon, Mrs. Mitchell was presented a silver bowl which is awarded annually to the year's most outstanding club woman. In making the presentation, Mrs. Wilfred Hopkins, outgoing president, referred to Mrs. Mitchell as one who preferred to work in the background rather than to receive direct credit for her good work.

Mrs. Lucille Richardson spent Sunday afternoon in Zebulon with her mother, Mrs. C. T. Williams and family.
