

This, That & the Other

By Mrs. Theo. B. Davis

It may seem a little thing to cause any irritation, but all his life I have had trouble convincing people my third son's name is F-e-r-d and not F-r-e-d. There must be in their minds the idea that I made a mistake and just didn't name him right, and they try to set me straight. He has been listed as Fred in college annuals, newspaper items, and everything of that kind. However, his Uncle Sam has in every instance put it Ferd, for which I am grateful.

As so often happens the magnolia shoulangeana had its first blooms open and hundreds of buds showing color when the freeze came. We are hoping those buds which are yet shut up tightly in their woolly capes may come through all right and open; but it is doubtful. If I knew all of them had been killed, I could stop worrying.

Monday morning the big holly tree just outside my kitchen window was almost crowded with birds. Ice over most berries brought numerous visitors to help devour those that were too far from outside for the sleet to cover. Jays and cardinals chatted with each other while the mocking birds shrieked at them. Finally the jays decided not to take any more abuse and there were several fights. The cardinals ate as fast as possible and when the party got too rough left without striking a blow.

A letter from my sister in Washington told of temperature twenty degrees below zero; of a flooded field used as a skating rink; of cars skidding together on icy roads. She mentioned that they are not trying to heat the front part of the house during the cold weather. If I got one room livable at twenty below outside, I'd never stir from it, I fear; for here twelve above is dreadful weather to endure.

One day recently I spoke of a day when I rode on a train all day, going north west, but feeling

I was going due east; and a miserable feeling it was. No amount of telling myself the engineer knew his business and the tracks were laid right could make comfortable. It did not appear to me that we could possibly reach our destination unless we swung far to the right.

The youngest son and the oldest grandson, both fliers, said they have had the same sensation when alone in the air and flying "on instruments." They felt the compass must surely have gone wrong and had an almost irresistible impulse to ignore it and go the way they felt inclined.

I asked what is done in such cases, and the boys replied: "Well, you'd best pay no attention to your feelings and put your mind on following your compass. If you don't—well—"

I couldn't help wondering how much difference it would make in our spiritual lives, if instead of following our own inclinations, we could by faith follow the course charted for us by One who knows the way, even though at times we must go through fogs of doubt, depending wholly upon what we have learned from the Pilot.

Study the seed catalogs, decide whether you really want to experiment with new plants or new varieties of old ones, whether you'd rather break your back leaning down to pick bush beans or driving stakes for running vines, make a lined-out plan for your garden or put in seeds haphazard as the notion strikes you; just go ahead, remembering that it will all turn into a nuisance about August, and you'll wish you had done things differently.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Poindexter of Winston Salem spent the weekend here with the C. V. Whitley family.
