Bankers Interested In Soil Conditions

"North Carolina farmers are just as poor as their soil is, and bankers, being sensitive to economic conditions, encourage conserving the soil and giving it an opportunity to achieve full production," G. Harold Myrick, Lincoln banker and chairman of the agriculture committee of the North Carolina Bankers Association, said this week.

Explaining why the Bankers Association sponsors an annual soil conservation speaking contest for high school students, Myrick said bankers are "keenly aware of the value of agriculture to the State as it relates to the whole economy and recognize that agriculture is the major base in such economy."

"In the speaking contest," he asserted, "we have stressed the techniques of soil conservation, its economic values to the State, and this year we emphasized soil wastage and its social aspects. The bankers of North Carolina will continue to boost every phase of economic development to the end that our great State will rate second to none in economic stability, prosperity, and financial leadership. This can be accomplished only through better farming, the very foundation of our economy."

Myrick pointed out that more than 4,500 students in 80 counties participated in this year's contest.
