Infra-Red Heat Proves Successful In Brooders at Massey's Hatchery

The use of infrared heat lamps, in place of brooders for baby chicks, is being demonstrated at Massey's Hatchery. This newest development in brooding baby chicks will make it possible for persons to raise as many as 100 chicks without any special equipment, other than the heat lamp and a small pen.

Mr. Massey, at Massey's Hatchery, explained that the use of the heat lamp has been thoroughly tested by the Poultry Research Department of the Ralston Purina Company, and is being recommended for the small poultry raisers as well as for farmers whose flocks are of commercial size.

"A person, with a wire pen, big enough to give the baby chicks ample room, can use the heat lamp in place of the traditional brooder," Massey said. "The lamp, placed in the center of the pen will provide all the necessary warmth to keep the birds comfortable and healthy.

"We have fixed up a typical pen, with 25 baby chicks in it and have placed it in the store. We will use only one 250-watt heat lamp, and whether the temperature rises or falls, the chicks will have enough heat."

The use of the heat lamp, he continued, will enable a lot of folks to raise chickens without the heavy investment of brooders and similar equipment. One lamp can take care of as many as 70 chicks, he added.

Survival When A-Bomb Strikes

A moving picture showing how to escape death from the atom bomb was shown to the Zebulon Rotary Club on Friday night by Haywood Jones.

Although many times as powerful as the bombs used in World War II the atom bomb will not mean the end of the world or of civilization, the moving picture showed.

Proper precautions, such as providing adequate shelter, knowing first aid treatment, and exercising necessary safety measures, will mean life for thousands of people when an atomic bomb strikes.
