Rain Fails to Dampen Spirits of Guardsmen

Sheets of rain and pellets of hail provided frequent interruptions during the weekend firing at Camp Butner by the local unit of the National Guard. The spring storms postponed the firing until late Saturday afternoon and caused it to be cancelled completely late Sunday morning before all the members of the battery had an opportunity to shoot the world-famous carbines.

Battery A engaged in the firing with the other four units of the 113th Field Artillery Battalion. The weekend at Camp Butner is an annual event for the Guardsmen.

In spite of the cancellation, two men qualified as marksmen with the carbine with eight rounds left to shoot. Pvt. Henry Kitchings and Pvt. Dallas Gurley both exceeded the 195 points needed.

Careful Preparations

Careful preparations kept the men dry during the long periods of rain. The pup tents were securely erected on high ground, and the clothing and equipment left in the tents was kept safe and dry.

The evening meal Saturday was prepared under the direction of the First Cook, Sgt. George Massey, assisted by Sgt. Max Williams, Cpl. Phiyip Williams, Cpl. Donald Fowler, and Pfc. Albert Stell.

Mess Steward Percy Parrish supervised the preparation of breakfast and dinner on Sunday. Bacon and eggs with cereal and fruit were served for breakfast at 5 o'clock, a. m., and dinner featuring fried chicken and pie was served at noon.

Targets, Pits

The targets and pits were operated under the direction of Lt. George Hinds.

Fire Direction personnel worked both Saturday and Sunday preparing for the combat efficiency test to be conducted at Fort McClellan in July.

Battery A had the best attendance of any of the five batteries, present at Camp Butner. Only one man was absent, making an attendance average of nearly 99%.

The next weekend training for Battery A will be conducted May 24-25.
