

EARPSBORO SCRIBBLIN'S

PLEASANT SIGHTS . . . Myrtie Chamblee fitting a darling little dress on her granddaughter, Neil's little girl . . . Viv Driver doing some fancy yo-yo-ing . . . the excitement of being the winner of a washing machine shining in Nell Creech's face . . . Maybelle Eatmon turning her head away and refusing to look at the burning of Atlanta in the GWTW picture . . . Lola Tippet helping guide the beginning steps of her young grandson, Johnny, Jr.

ABOUT FUNERALS . . . they were chattering away, these community women, about funerals . . . "I just don't enjoy a funeral unless I can see the body," said one pushing her glasses farther on the bridge of her nose . . . an inquiring nose . . . the last time she had gone to a funeral she had arrived too late to view the corpse and was simply ill with herself and proceeded to ask everybody she came in contact with how the body looked, how the hands were folded, the color of the shroud, how the hair was fixed, et cetera . . . "Oh, the flowers are what I go for," said another as she made herself more comfortable by yanking at her Spencer which seemed to be a little too tight . . . "I always count the designs either while they are in the church or after they have been put on the grave . . . you can always tell the person's prominence by the number of flowers they have." . . . said another er reaching for a king-sized cigarette and emitting a dragon-like cloud of heavy smoke, "I go to see how the family takes it . . . the last one I went to, why this particular person, and you all know him well, why this person did not shed a tear, not one tear" . . . "Not me," said one straightening the seam in her hose and to her horror finding a run, "I go to see what is worn . . . did you see what I saw the other day? . . . my, but I wouldn't have been caught dead in that get-up she had on . . . really girls, it was outda-

And I wondered to myself if there is anybody today that goes to funerals out of mere sympathy and not out of sadistic curiosity.

ONE MAN'S IDEA OF SPRING . . . with the days beginning to warm, the buds beginning to burst forth, and the earth in its renaissance, men in our community have begun to turn to farming.

Since all the farms today are more or less mechanized, they talk about these mechanical implements, of what they can or cannot do with them, of how well they can cultivate or not cultivate with them, and many say they don't see how they got along without them all these years. These conversations sometimes go on for hours, especially if it is a rainy day and the men are congregated in some country store.

One man said that even though his own farm is mechanized with all that he can afford and a little more than he can afford, to him there is still nothing prettier than a shiny black strapping Negro holding to bright red plow handles, a plow with a slick new wing, and two well-kept white horses turning up fragrant rich top soil, readying it for planting.

TOPICS . . . having attended a number of quilting parties in this section during the past weeks, I found that the general topics of conversations ran thusly . . . operations, preachers, dieting, children and grandchildren.

OBSERVATIONS . . . sitting in the choir and looking down on the congregation . . . noticing audience reactions . . . and looking at the feet of the women under the first and second pews . . . some with their shoes off, some crossed demurely . . . some resting their ankles on the floor . . . some fidgeting . . . feet tell a lot.

According to U.S.D.A., lack of sulphur has been detected in some southern soils.
