Police Chief Is Acquitted; Mayor, Board Defend Him

Willie B. Hopkins, veteran police chief of Zebulon, was acquitted of violating a city fire ordinance in Raleigh City Court Friday, April 9.

The 42-year-old police chief of Zebulon, testified that two Raleigh policemen grabbed his arm and hustled him toward a door at Reynolds Coliseum during the Atlantic Coast Conference basketball tournament.

Hopkins further testified that he was searching his pockets for a ticket when he was asked to leave the aisle at the Coliseum.

City Patrolman A. E. Morris said Hopkins had been drinking and quoted the chief as saying, "I ain't moving no damn place."

Another patrolman, R. L. Bunn, said he assisted Morris in taking Hopkins to a control room to talk to him.

The officers said Hopkins was standing in an aisle, which is prohibited by a Raleigh fire ordinance.

Hopkins claimed he stepped back when first requested to do so by Patrolman Morris. He said he tried to find his ticket when Morris asked him the second time.

Hopkins said Patrolman Bunn then grabbed his left arm and the officers hustled him toward a door. He denied cursing and drinking.

Mayor Ed Hales and the Town Board gave Police Chief Hopkins a vote of confidence Saturday after his acquittal in a Raleigh court.

The following is a statement by Hales in defense of Zebulon's popular police chief.

"Along with other members of the community of Zebulon, I am greatly distressed by the accounts in the Raleigh newspapers of the trial of W. B. Hopkins, chief of police of the Town of Zebulon, in Raleigh City Court on a charge of obstructing the aisle at Reynolds Coliseum on Friday night, March 4, 1960, during an Atlantic Coast Conference basketball game.

"The newspaper stories, while factually accurate as far as they went, did not reveal the halting, evasive, and contradictory nature (Continued on page 8)
