One Pole Too Many

The shorter pole—owned by a rural electric cooperative—was built in 1949 to serve a rural home.

Then—10 years later—the area became more densely populated and was annexed into a town. That's when the taller pole was put up by a commercial, investor-owned power company—the same company which would not serve the area when it was sparsely populated.

The company and the town said to the co-op, "Get out."

Fair? Hardly. What's more, it isn't just the cooperatives who suffer when their members are taken away by these duplicate lines—although it means one less member to share the cost of electric service. All consumers lose. After all, the cost of the unnecessary power company lines is a part of its customers' electric bills.

North Carolina's rural electric cooperatives believe they—and the rest of the public—should be protected from wasteful duplication which makes the cost of electric service higher than it really should be.
