GHOSTS, GOBLINS, SPOOKS AND WITCHES RULE CITY

Halloween Celebration Here Noisy One With Weird Figures Taking Charge of the Streets.

Even Halloween is celebrated now with jazz!

Time was when spooky, woolly spirits and figures moved calmly and quietly through the night. But now Halloween is celebrated in a squeaky, weaky manner.

Eeries and spooks and witches and goblins were abroad Thursday night but they moved with noise and confusion. They no longer sought to gain prominence through stealth and suddenness of approach. They jaxxed along and the night rang with their noises.

Not so long ago Halloween parties were scary things. A little party around a low burning fire. Some one told a spooky, woolly story and everybody went home to wild and scary dreams.

But the spooks and goblins work in the great open spaces now. They have discarded the broomstick for the auto as their means of travel and they care nothing for the indoor stuff. The streets here during the night were alive with weird figures that moved without set destination. While spooks courted goblins on foot through the business sections of the city, witches who hid behind painted faces were ridden about the city in autos by stately eeries who found Halloween a timely time to carry on the game that is so old and yet to them, so new.

Halloween parties were held in many sections of the city and games appropriate to the occasion were enjoyed. Prizes were given for the best costumes and the judges found before them a variety of weird figures that would have been at home at a carnival of gnomes in the Black Forest.

Though divorced from its pagan origins, Halloween in the heart of this western hemisphere, is faintly colored with the trailing fires of playful Druid goblins and the smoke of ancient Druid rituals. The wild-eyed yellow-faced pumpkins that stare at one from the walls still have the power to stir a child's and altogether delightful terror.

The two chief characteristics of Halloween in ancient times were the lighting of bonfires and the belief that of all nights in the year this was the one during which ghosts and witches were most likely to wander about. At long about the first of November, the Druids held their great autumn festival and lighted fires in honor of the Sun-god in thanksgiving for the harvest. Also, it was a Druidic belief that on the eve of this festival, Saman, Lord of Death, called together the wicked souls that within the past twelve months had been condemned to inhabit the bodies of animals.

To this day the practice of lighting bonfires survives. In New York City, for instance, small boys gather refuse and start fires in the streets. Bonfires are also lighted in other parts of the country as part of the Halloween celebration.

The 1924 witch is vastly different from the witch of the Druid days but she at least, has confidence in her own witchery.
