WORLD'S WORST TRAIN FROM CONSTANTINOPLE

French Writer Says Decrepit Road Has No Convenience of Any Kind. For thirty hours we have been bumped together in the collection of ancient and decrepit cars that form the famous train de luxe from Constantinople to Angora, the sole link uniting ancient and modern Turkey.

A delightful journey! No sleeping accommodations, no dining car, no conveniences of any kind. Seated on dirty, uncomfortable benches on which we are forbidden to lie down, stifled by the heat, and assaulted by vermin, our sole preoccupation during the trip has been to find at every stop a little fresh water, even if undrinkable.

Between Constantinople and Angora there is but a single eating station, at Kalesher, a place of unhappy memory. Suspicious soup, high meat, squash swimming in a black mutton tallow gravy, and bitter beer! Even the douzico (champagne) was abominable. It smelled of denatured alcohol and puckered the lips. During the rest of the trip I lived on the country: sour milk mixed with water and green fruit.
