Open Every Night

Post and Flag's Cotton Letter. New York, Dec. 15.—Covering which was in evidence to some extent during the early trading, gave the market a generally steady to firm ton but sentiment if anything is still bearish on the average, though the disease seems losing some of its recent virulence. With the inventory season close at hand mills naturally are not disposed to accumulate stocks especially with the supply outlook painted in such rosy colors for them. The net result is that as soon as the demand from scattered shorts slackens prices hesitate and begin to sag again under local selling for a turn and scattering hedges.

General expectation is for large ginning for the period with the natural inference that will bring an increased volume of hedging which has been freely discounted by operations for short account. That view, however, is not universally accepted since in many well informed quarters it is realized that a large portion of what is now being picked is below contract requirements and is being sold at such low prices that buyers prefer to ride it wide open rather than take any chances by putting out a hedge against what could be delivered if that necessity arose.
