THE COTTON CONFERENCE

Decides That the Salvation of the Farmer Depends on Three Things. Raleigh, Nov. 15.—(AP)—The cotton conference in Raleigh last week decided that the salvation of the cotton farmer depended upon three things:

The immediate necessity of speeding up application of the first two remedies is universally recognized. The first, that is financial aid, is already prepared for application. The second, which takes in plans for acreage reduction has already been discussed at a general meeting, and it is stated to be placed in the shape of a definite proposal when the committee headed by Dr. E. C. Brooks meets here on November 19th.

Unless the farmers are taught "good farming" and definitely educated away from asking their all on one crop, all the present efforts will go for naught, they say. They admit, however, that "good farming" cannot be put into effect by the mere passing of a resolution or the signing of a note at a bank.

For years the extension services of the agricultural branches of state departments have been dining their name of "diversification." The present cotton debacle indicates that their job is a hard one. It is admitted that there are few tasks harder than to wean away a farmer definitely wedded to cotton.

This year, with a horrible example to argue, greater success is expected, and greater efforts are to be made, according to extension chiefs.

With a booklet issued by the agricultural extension division of State college working in conjunction with the United States department of agriculture. The booklet was entitled "Farm Program for North Carolina in 1927."

It outlines the present over-production situation, stresses the danger of a general shift to any other "money crop" such as tobacco, and gives a comprehensive plan for diversification. The plan was divided into eight parts, each of which, it was said, "are substantiated by actual demonstrations with successful farmers and by experience of groups of farmers in these counties where such programs have been followed."

The eight points are: First—Each farmer should grow sufficient grain and roughage to supply the needs of his stock.

Second—Grow an all-year garden for the purpose of supplying the needs of his family with the necessary vegetables, and in most cases have a surplus for the market.

Third—Keep at least fifty laying hens to supply needs of his own family and have a surplus of both poultry and eggs for market.

Fourth—Keep at least one family cow to supply the family with milk and butter, and wherever sufficient feeds are available, additional cows to produce milk and butter to be sold on the market.

Fifth—Produce sufficient pork for the family's needs. If surplus corn is available, increase the supply of hogs as to be able to sell on the local market or to be able to take part in co-operative carlot shipments to the larger markets, thus increasing the family income.

Sixth—Plant cotton only on the best cotton lands, and restrict the acreage to those lands that will produce at least a half a bale during a normal season.

Seventh—Have at least two so-called money crops. Eighth—Begin definite rotation of crops, which should include a legume crop grown on at least one-fourth of the cultivated acreage each year so as to improve the fertility of the soil and ultimately to be able to reduce the cost of production.
