MILTON NEWS.

The Milton high school is planning to play some good games of basket ball this fall. The court is being repaired and put into shape. The girls and boys teams are practicing in preparation for the coming season.

Rev. J. C. Canipe, of Mebane, conducted a great revival at the Baptist church recently. Thirty six came forward during the meeting and surrendered their lives to Jesus Christ, or re-consecrated themselves for service.

Rev. Mrs. Canipe is doing a great work as an evangelist. He clings to the word of God and is a faithful, consecrated and devout servant of Jesus Christ. The whole town was delighted by his messages, and the Holy Spirit was present in power. The design that dress. The style is a big part of the dress. It will pay you to trade with us. Try it. Wilburn & Satterfield.

Mebane is to be congratulated upon having him there as pastor of the Baptist church.

Many of our people have been attending the Danville and Roxboro fairs, which were held this week at the same time.—Hugh L. Nichols.

COOPERATIVE WEALTH.

Whether the cooperative marketing system turns out to be a success in America or not remains to be seen. It has proven entirely successful in many cases in this country, as is shown by the results in the western states. In the two great money crops—cotton and tobacco—it is now on trial, and the next year or two will demonstrate whether it is to be the good thing for farmers that the promoter believe it will.

But, judging from Dr. E. C. Branson's reports from Denmark there is not the slightest doubt about its effectiveness over there. Speaking of Odense, Dr. Branson says:

"I went through the creamery, the bacon factory, and the egg-packing plant, and heard at length about the 110 steamboats that carry the farm product of Denmark into every large port of the world. Every one of these huge enterprises is organized, owned, and operated by the farmers themselves & their highly salaried agents. And what Odense is every other town in Denmark is—a center of cooperative farm business.

"Culture and cooperation have made these farmers rich, and a prosperous agriculture has dotted the map with prosperous cities. To be sure of this fact, you have only to move about Denmark a little. Not only are the Danes rich but they are modern in the last degree, and beautiful every way.

"The reportable farm surplus last year was $250,000,000" reckoned in our money. And mind you, they are enterprises on part of a state with just about the population and less than one-fourth the size of North Carolina."

Cooperative marketing has converted a poorer country into one of the richest, and has made a prosperous people out of a most humble class. If it has done that in Denmark, who nature has not been so kind, it could make every person wealthy in nature-favored country like the southern part of the United States.

The cooperative theory is right, and it works when properly put into effect. If it fails in this country it will be because of fault in the manner of getting it into effect.

Commerce and Finance, speaking of the co-operative system, says:

"Co-operative cotton marketing is an indictment of the waste and sharp practice of the present system. We boast the efficiency of American commerce, and it is efficient in many respects, but it fails miserably in the supreme test, which is the total cost of getting the commodity from the producer to the consumer. The American farmer is the best farmer in the world in that he produces more per man, but he receives less of the consumer's dollar than the farmer in any other enlightened country. That is the damning charge which commerce must meet. The farmer is in revolt. He may be defeated in this attempt; he may fail by his own blundering, but he will win ultimately by one means or another.

They are blind who do not see in the present movement a desperate resolution of those who feed and clothe the world to receive a more equitable share of the world's income and accumulation. Heretofore the American farmer has been conservative; his cooperative undertakings for self help and self protection are conservative. Let commerce be careful not to make him radical."—Durham Herald.
