PART TWO.
CHAPTER CXLII.
A Pitiful Story.

Landry sat in his revolving chair by the table, a book open before him. He had taken off his dress coat, and was wearing his office coat. He glanced up as we came in, and said:

"Did you enjoy yourselves?"

"Oh, it was perfectly lovely, Landry!" Margaret exclaimed. "It is too bad you missed it! I never enjoyed anything more in all my life! I think I shall coax Warren to come to New York so that I can go to the opera."

"Did you enjoy it too, Sybil?" Landry asked, looking at me.

"No, I did not! and you knew I wouldn't when you left us. I don't see why you have to spoil everything for me by always running away."

"I am sorry my going prevented your enjoying yourself," he replied, "but a doctor has to go when needed."

"I am so sick of hearing that," I said pettishly.

Landry made no answer, but asked Warren to read something in the book before him. They talked in technical terms for a few moments; then Landry arrested my attention. He said:

"It is one of the most pitiful cases, Warren, that I ever have known."

"Tell me if you will, it promises to be interesting."

"The case is interesting, but the circumstances are almost sickening. When she first came to me—"

"Who?" I interrupted him.

"Mrs. Hyde; when she first came to me, as I started to say, she told me nothing save her general symptoms and for some time I worked in the dark. Then one day when her nerves were overwrought, she told Miss Hopkins and then me. I insisted upon an examination immediately, and found she had cancer of the breast caused by a fall. Her brute of a husband had come home drunk and had pushed her, and she had hid fallen against the corner of a heavy table and bruised herself horribly. She was proud and hid it from everyone, even her maid, although it pained her very badly at times."

"Did she tell him—her husband?" Margaret asked, her face tender with pity.

"No, most of all she hid it from him. He said he nursed her, but I have my own opinion on that. You remember what we saw on the roof garden one night, Sybil. If a man will attempt, will threaten to strike a woman in public, he is apt to do it at home. She has gradually grown worse. Only her indomitability will enable her to keep up."

"But she didn't look ill! I thought she looked perfectly well," Margaret interposed. I was too interested to interrupt.

"She had a clever maid. She has been determined all along that he, her husband, shouldn't know he had caused her illness. I have seen her without any aid of the toilet, and she is ghastly."

A Second Inquiry.

"What nerve!" Warren said, a note of admiration in his voice.

"Wonderful," Landry responded. "But, as I said, she has gradually been growing worse. I have tried to persuade her to be operated upon, but she has steadfastly refused. I have made her as comfortable as I could, hoping she would consent before it was too late."

"Oh, if people would only take such things in time," Warren said sententiously.

"When I was sent for tonight, I feared something terrible had happened from the wording of the message. My worst fears were realized: He—Hyde—had come home drunk, and in an ugly frame of mind. She had expostulated with him; and in anger he pushed her again—at least that's what she said he did—and again she fell and unfortunately struck herself in almost the same place. This time on the edge of a carved chair. All the brute had done afterward was to curse and leave the house. Her maid sent the message. She had at least been obliged to take her into her confidence. I have sent a nurse for the night; but shall go back again myself. Poor little woman. I tell you Warren, I never saw such courage. She begged me not to let him know he had hurt her."

"I shall probably not live long," she said as calmly as the pain would permit. "And it would be a lasting sorrow if he knew, or thought, he had been in any way the cause of it—even accidentally."

"Oh, how terrible!" It was Margaret again who spoke.

"It is indeed," Landry said as he looked at his watch. "I think I'll walk around there now."

"I'll go with you if I may. You probably won't remain long and I'll smoke outside," Warren offered.

"Yes, come on; I should like to talk over the case with you. I shall insist upon the operation tomorrow. She has already given in far enough to promise to see Doctor Ward."

"He'll persuade her," Warren rejoined as they passed out of the room.

Then Margaret said:

"Isn't it terrible! Such a lovely woman, and Janet said the other day that she was as lovely in character as in face. Some way I never can reconcile such things coming to people like her, while others seem to go free."

Tomorrow—THE AFTERMATH.

HORSE AMBULANCES FOR THE AMERICAN FORCES

Albany, N. Y., Feb. 28.—Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, the "Poet Laureate of Humanity," is on her way to France as general representative of the American Red Star Animal Relief. She is to see General Pershing and to offer two motor veterinary ambulances, costing $10,000, given by American citizens through the American Red Star.

Dr. William O. Stillman, director general of the Red Star, interviewed at the national headquarters in this city, and the offer was part of the Red Star's efforts to cooperate with the American army. "Our army," he said "has one horse or mule to every four men and it is necessary for the success of the campaign that the horse supplies should be maintained at that high standard. With ships becoming scarcer and the demand for ship-space more imperative, it is essential that every curable horse should be saved.

"The European armies are giving the greatest possible care to wounded animals. The British have a magnificent hospital service so efficiently managed that 84 per cent of the animal cases are being cured and shipped back to the battlefield.

"The American army must be as well equipped as the best of the European armies in this respect, and we are arranging to have these ambulances sent from England to save time and ship-space. The ambulances are of the new type and each will carry two horses.

"Of course, the Red Star will send as many as are needed. The offer through Mrs. Wilcox is just the beginning—a rush order to meet the earliest emergencies."

GOOD SCHEME, ALL RIGHT

But Boats in Hot Water Bottles is Bound to Have Odor.

Rocky Mount, Feb. 28.—Many are the schemes of the liquor smugglers. The story is going the rounds how an Elm City negro was on a visit to his brother at Hartford, Connecticut, recently, where rubber hot water bottles are manufactured. Having a desire to return to the Old North State with a supply of that beverage which caused the anti-saloon league to be organized the hot water bottle idea seemed a safe one.

Therefore, he proceeded to buy out adjoining breweries and gave a number of hot water bottles all they could hold. He then tucked the bottles safely into a box and sent them on their way rejoicing to Elm City checked as baggage. All went well until he reached Elm City. He found the box with the contraband, and he also saw several men with shining buttons on their clothes. The man, no doubt believed the self-preservation, better known as "safety first" is the first law of nature, turned his back on the box and the officers in disgust, and started out for no fixed destination, although he was in considerable earnest to get there. And he hasn't been seen since.

The aroma given off by the box didn't have an innocent smell to the officers, and naturally being inquisitive, they proceeded to take a peep on the inside. And this peep was the undoing of the son of Africa.

ARE PREPARING TO TAKE U. S. CENSUS

Plans Being Laid at Washington by the Officials for the National Census in 1920.

Preparations are being made for the 1920 census, with especial attention to statistics covering the industries and employes in the development of natural resources. A bill providing for the 1920 census will be reported in a few days by the house census committee, of which Representative Harvey Helm of Kentucky is chairman.

Supervisors and enumerators of population and agriculture probably will number between 85,000 and 90,000 and for manufacturers, mines and quarries under separate supervision, there will be 1,500 employes in the field with from 1,000 to 2,000 clerks and other employes in the census office.

The bill is expected to follow recommendations of a special committee appointed by the director of the census, which suggested that the Philippines, not included in the thirteenth census, should not be included in the fourteenth, and that a census of the Virgin Islands is now in progress, and another one is unnecessary in 1920. In Guam, Samoa and the Panama Canal zone special censuses can readily be taken at small cost if congress orders it, the committee reported.

The committee also recommended that the new census be extended to show the nationality or mother tongue of all persons in this country born in foreign countries and nationality or foreign tongue of foreign born persons. It suggested that the population enumeration be based on January 1, 1920, instead of April 15, as in the past, that there be a biennial census of the products of manufacturing industries and that the census of animals slaughtered be dispensed with as approximately accurate conclusions regarding meat and hide production can be reached from other sources.

MEXICO WILL HAVE SOME COFFEE TO QUENCH THIRST

Mexico City, Feb. 28.—The management of the National railways has chartered two merchant ships to transport from Puerto, Mexico, 100,000 sacks of coffee which have piled up there as a result of the paralysis of sea traffic since the beginning of the year, it is announced. The coffee will be sent, it is stated, to the United States and Belgium countries of the old world. The movement of this supply, it is added, will prevent the threat of planters in the southern part of this country and other neighboring republics to plant no land to coffee this season. Over supply of the product in Mexico has caused prices to fall to an unprecedented figure.

Nora's Nerve

Mistress—Nora, my husband is raving over those lamb chops you sent up. He says they are raw and he is acting like a wild man.

Nora—Then, shure, mum, if he's acting like a wild man, raw mite is just the food for him.—Boston Transcript.

Hun "Tobacco" Has Many Ingredients But No Tobacco

Paris, Feb. 28.—"The eternal 'pas de tabac' bids fair to haunt our ears like the 'pas de femmes' song in the 'Petit Duc.' The price of tobacco has risen, but there is no tobacco. We smokers would not find if the prices were increased a hundred-fold under these conditions, but what we want is tobacco." Such is the airy comment of a man in the street yesterday. "But still," he added, as he threw away a half-smoked cigar, pulled out another, lit it, and puffed away contentedly "thank goodness, I'm not a German."

He paused significantly, drew a copy of the "Liberte" from his pocket and began to read:—"The tobacco found on German prisoners has been analyzed and found to contain hops, twigs and leaves of fennel, cow's lungwort, mint, vervain, wild oats, briar and reed, pith from the elder tree, scraps of bark, scrapings from camembert cheese, brown paper, emery cloth and pieces of umbrella covering."

He had flung the "Liberte" from him at the word "bark" and had been carried away by his feelings. "Yes, sir," he said defiantly, "the Germans are worse off than we are for tobacco, but (and he filled a capacious pipe before continuing) that is no excuse. They deserve to be worse off."
