A man who can add, [illegible] multiply any sums of [illegible] knows no the language, and can tell other men how to do it, should not be left without a little [illegible] something to count.

Our Railroads.

We often read in the newspapers that the men who have organized and conducted the railroad enterprises of the United States are grasping and soulless monopolists. No doubt, many of them are controlled by selfish ambition, and have been unscrupulous in their methods.

Yet in their very misconduct they could not help benefiting the public. Think what wonders they have done during the last forty years! Think what would be to-day the condition of the country if we had had no railroad monopolists!

In 1880, our railroads carried four hundred million tons of merchandise one mile, at twenty five dollars a ton, ten thousand millions of dollars. But the railroads did something more than merely carry this incalculable amount of property; they caused a very large part of it to be produced. The railroads may be justly said to have created the States that [illegible] this stupendous commerce. Example.

[illegible] a line of little use for Cincinnati [illegible] to induce new manufactories by [illegible] and New York [illegible] finished pianos a week, if there were no way to get those bulky articles transported to the remote States of the Union.

A Temperance Prince.

There was once a little Prince who taught his grandfather, the old King Astyages, a good lesson in temperance. The little fellow's name was Cyrus, and when he became a man he did so many great and noble deeds that he was called Cyrus the Great, King of Persia.

He had been brought up to a very simple mode of life, foregoing all the luxuries and ease that we naturally suppose a young prince should be entitled to, so that he might become accustomed to the hardship that help to make up the life of a great soldier.

But when he was thirteen years old his mother took him to Media to visit the old King his grandfather, and here he saw all the pride and luxury and magnificence that reigned supreme at the court for Astyages loved pomp and costly show, and their apparel. But the thing that most astonished young Cyrus was the intemperance. He had been taught to be strictly temperate, and it surprised and mortified him to see the noble lords, and even the King himself, become foolishly drunk at the great feasts.

One day Cyrus, in his high, fun-loving spirit, undertook to act as cupbearer for his grandfather. In those days, you know, the king always had a cupbearer who presented the cup to him, but before the king drank of it, the cupbearer always tasted it to make sure it was not poisoned.

Little Cyrus presented the cup to the King with much ease and grace, and the old monarch was delighted; but as he took the cup he said:

"But my boy, you forgot one thing. You forgot to taste the wine."

"Not at all," said Cyrus, for he was not through forgetfulness that I omitted that part of the ceremony."

"Why then?"

"Because I was afraid there was poison in the liquor," replied the boy.

"Poison, child?" cried the old King. "Poison, and yet you gave it to me! Why what do you mean?"

"Yes, grandfather," answered Cyrus. "There is poison enough in it, for at a feast, when the lords of the court, and the guests, drink a little of that liquor, their heads get turned and they act like fools. Your friends hooted and sang and made strange noises, and you yourself could scarcely stand upon your legs."

"Why," said the King, "have you never seen your father do the same thing?"

"Never," cried Cyrus.

"Then what happens to him when he drinks?" asked the King.

"When he drinks," answered Cyrus, "his thirst is quenched with water."—Kaleidoscope.

The Pyramids Built Downward.

Mr. Cope Whitehouse, who seems to be treated as a crank by the Science Association in meeting at Philadelphia, got the stage of the academy as the scientists were leaving the hall Wednesday, and proceeded to give an illustrated lecture on "The Libyan Deserts." Some of the audience remained and others out of curiosity turned back to hear him.

Mr. Whitehouse enunciated some singular scientific theories, based upon the most careful researches. One of these was that the Pyramids had been built partically downward not upward. He took Herodotus and other ancient writers for his authorities, and on the strength of personal examination, which he had made, expressed the opinion that the chambers, at the base of the Pyramids, had been used for temples and were constructed beneath the center of big hills, and that the apex of these hills had been cut off, and, through the holes thus made the big boulders of rocks had been dropped one upon another until they had risen to a new apex. The hills he said, were then smoothed off and the sides of the Pyramids molded, leaving them as they are seen today. The theory presented by Mr. Whitehouse is not novel. It has been advanced before. Whatever its merits, says the New York Tribune—and if the judgment of the standing committee be taken as final, it has none—it is the subject of much comment to-day, that the committee should have shown such animosity in the matter. There are probably many more dangerous "cranks" in the ranks of the association than Mr. Whitehouse. There are many scientists whose opinion is entitled to weight who think that Mr. Whitehouse's services in other branches of science have been eminent. He is, for instance, recognized as an authority on the Lybian deserts. But his notions regarding the Pyramids are generally ridicule and little attention paid to them."

Importance of Trifles.

"Trifles make perfection, and perfection is no trifle," said the old Greek sculptor to a stupid critic, who observing the artist giving the finishing touches to his statue, observed that he was wasting his time on trifles. A writer in an English magazine illustrates the importance of trifles in sculpture by an anecdote of Talleyrand, one of the great diplomats of the last generation.

The writer was visiting him in Paris not long before his death, when he found him busy with his celestial "Pandora"—unfished as it seemed, but still "in the clay."

Here she stood—a model of perfection—chef d'oeuvre in her kind. The old man sat before it and philosophized somewhat after the fashion of the Marquis de Cinq Mars.

Nobody cared, he said, for good work, and nobody knew a good piece of work when he saw it. Even connoisseurs, when they came to look at a picture, or a statue, or a piece of furniture, only looked at the general effect, and never troubled themselves about the details. Now, he had taken more pains with the figure before him than with anything else he had ever done, and yet how many people would ever notice the difference between it and the work of a common sculptor?

"Well, I can see," he explained, "that the kids were going to have a game of hot ball a dollar. Boy didn't go by rules to govern, but when we got up the alley there was a set standing. One boy undertook that he could kick and bite, and throw other wanted to use a slung shot. A feller he had the rules, but couldn't read 'em, and while everybody was all mixed up a policeman came along and the store and lounged the crowd. The only feller who played is the one who was holding the stakes."
