Since the publication of Bulletin No. So on the late potato crop in the South, a number of growers have writen to me hat in their experience they found it ast to cut the potatoes before bedding to sprout. My own experience seemed to indicate that they should not be cut, and therefore insisted upon planting them whole. This season I have tested both methods and find that while all the cut potatoes sprouted in time for planting in August, a large number of the uncut ones failed to sprout. As one who attempts to instruct others should always be sure of his points. I write this to say that the indications seem to point to ar error on my part in insisting so strongly upon not cutting.
