A well-known general officer in the Confederate army from this State is evidently by no means pleased with the history which Mr. Nash is writing of the cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia. He said to me to-day, "You can say that I have read some of this history in the Atlanta Constitution and that if Mr. Nash's book is made up of such stuff then I don't care to see it. Mr. Nash is the reputed adjutant-general of W. H. F. Lee's division."

His Genial Reception.

General Starr, a gallant old soldier, had an irrepressible dislike for young Bentenants fresh from West Point. In 1874 General Starr was in command at Fort Riley, and one day an orderly came to his quarters with the message atorm was central last night near Key that Lieutenant Morrison, just from West Point, was at the post ready to pay his respects and report for duty In response to this message the old when his wife, a motherly old soul, plucked him by the sleeve and said, "Now, general, promise me that you won't be rough with that young man." "Rough?" said the old man, smiling > cream unless the young dog riles me." Reaching his office, the general was confronted with a dapper little fellow as spick and span as though be had just come from the hands of his barbe and tailor, while he had the half super cilious air that seems inseparable from the first stages of military education. Looking the young lieutenant over for half a moment, the old general said with great dignity: "How do you do, Mr. Morrison. I am pleased to see you." Then as a flush gradually mounted over his weather beaten features be added: "I am always glad to see you young men from the Military academy. You—you—there the general ended with a roar) you think yourself so banged smart!"—Kansas City Journs.
