SOYBEAN GROWING SPREADS OVER
ENTIRE NATION

Raleigh, N. C., Aug. 18.—More than twenty states of the Union are now growing soybeans, a crop which spread from a small beginning in eastern North Carolina less than one-half a century ago.

"In 1924," says C. B. Williams, head of the department of Agronomy at State College, "more than two and one-half million acres were devoted to the production of this popular summer legume crop. Most of this increase has come about in the last five or six years. The popularity of the soybean is due to its wide range of soil and climatic adaptation; to its suitability in fitting in with various crop rotations; its relative ease and cheapness of production; its wide range of usefulness for feeding purposes and its great value in increasing the fertility of the soil."

The soybean when rightly grown states Prof. Williams, is a valuable crop in building up the the fertility of the soil. It is doubtful if another crop can match the hearty favor and the rapid spread in growth and use which this crop has enjoyed in the last few years. Farmers use the bean largely for seed purposes, for hay production and for grazing. North Carolina is still the great seed producing center. Over 47 percent of the crop grown in this state is sold for seed. Mr. Williams states that the cost of production is relatively low, usually running from $1.20 to $1.50 when all costs are added. When the bean is grown in corn or other crops, or when the harvester is used, the cost is cut.

Prof. Williams states also that as farmers learn the value of the bean for feeding to livestock, the production of seed will be lessened. There is still a surplus produced, however, and this can be used to depress prices unless a suitable market is found. The market is to be had apparently in crushing the beans for oil. The United States consumes over 25 million pounds of crude soybean oil per year and this will require the crushing of a little over one-half million bushels to produce this oil. The amount crushed in the United States would provide an excellent outlet for the surplus seed.
