The Green Room of Journalism.

The lecture on Thursday night by Mr. Frank W. Mack, Superintendent of the Associated Press, was one of especial interest. It dealt with the inner side of newspaper work, the devices and stratagems to which the correspondent must resort to obtain news before the other fellow. This was a subject which, though known to few, is of interest to all. The speaker's humor in telling his experiences added a pleasant flavor to his talk.

"You often see," said Mr. Mack, "a short article in a paper and pass it by after a mere glance. But if you knew the way that article came there you would be more than interested. The experience of the news getter is much more dramatic than the piece of news he gives you. When the American troops were charging up San Juan hill, there was a squad of correspondents behind them, exposing themselves to the fire of the enemy, running here and there to a wounded or dying soldier, getting from him his name, that their papers might be the first to tell the loss. The papers told a dramatic story of that charge, but said nothing of the heroic work of these reckless newspaper men. That was something behind the printed page, in the Green Room of Journalism."

The speaker, continuing, told some of his own experiences in newspaper work. He told of the various devices and plans for getting the news of General Grant's death from his home, and sending it down to Printing House Square before the other papers learned of it. His description of the way in which he got news of the actions of the Spanish-American Peace Commission, sitting in Paris in 1898, was especially interesting and amusing. The members of the Commission were sworn to secrecy and would tell nothing directly. It was only by a combination of bluff, caution and device that news was obtained from them. The speaker closed by telling of how, as a newspaper man, he had helped to start the ex-convict Michael Dunn on his work of saving other ex-convicts from new crime. This man look these men he had known in prison and gave them a home and work, and in this way instituted a work that has meant much for several of the large cities of the United States.
