From the Correspondence of Raoul de Siard.

Chapel Hill 3 Jan. 1908.
Mademoiselle Louise Elmer,
Blowed-on-Rock N. C.

Deer:—I am glad to learn you are the friend of Monsieur Smith, mon ami John. He is very curious, that man; and I think I shall do pleasure to you in telling you, he has acted strange this last time. You see, all the winter, he has come on the table with the long face. He no eat and she no drink. I think he is very sick: I say John, is it on the liver, you suffer? He say: no. Then I reduplicate and I say: is the pain in your long? He smile and he gives a response: no, it is not in the long. I see that he is triste, and I no care to ask it again. So he get very thin and he has the air very miserable.

The week lately, he come on the table with the most beautiful sourire on its lips, and she eats like one famished wolf. I see the exchange: I say: John, you have the air very good, mon ami. You have eaten like four; what has arrived?

Then he smile mysteriously: You see, Raoul, he say, last week I no had the good news, this week I have the good news. Voila tout. I say no more and I eat my supper. After one little time, he take out his watch, and she say to me: You know what time it is? I say: no, whatfor you of me ask that? I do not inquiete myself of the time. Then he does very strange, he pull out his watch and he hold it under the table; I look up and when she sees that I regard him, he smile and he say: it is now six hours thirty. I astonish myself, and five minutes after, it pulls out the watch again, and it say: it is now six hours thirty five. I cannot support it more longer, and I say:

Sacre nom de tonnerre, what is the material with you? You continue to tell me the hour. I no care to know for the hour. You have lost the head. He laugh, and he did not give me one response. Then he puts the watch back but you see ten minutes after, he pulls it out again—and I remark, that he no look at the hands, but on the back of the watch: Do you know he say to me, what time—I intrupt him, Allez au diable, I say, you has lost the head. I say no more to him. cependant I am astonished, to see him do so funny. Do you know Mademoiselle Louise, what is the trouble with him? He say to me: Miss Louise it is the finest demoiselle in the whole world. I am sure you know all the secrets of his malady. I would tell you to write to John, and to find out why she is so disorderly on the brain.

Next week I write you one other lettre, and I shall recount you how John does this week. Excuse my imperfection in the english speech, I no can spell so good as Shakespeare, the great American poete. You have to remember that it is my interest in John, who is my internal friend, and in the same time devotedly yours, that makes me invoice this word to you.

Kindly agree, Mademoiselle, to the expresion the most sincere of my sentiments the most respectful. I shake rapidly a hasty farewell on your hands.

Your servant entirely devoted,
RAOUL DE SIARD.
