The pride of George Bernard Shaw has been humbled at last. Every ready to quiz others and turn even their shafts of ridicule to his own advantage, a North Carolinian has found the joint in his harness. He will write a Tar Heel biography of the great Irish dramatist, who is so appalled at the prospect that the smile of derision with which he greets the announcement has something of the hard, dry quality of a grin upon the face of the Cheshire cat. Mr. Shaw anticipates his biographer by explaining some of the circumstances which led up to the undertaking. This Mr. Henderson, of the Old North State, asked for Shawian data enough to make a sketch of half a page. Mr. Shaw exclaims by way of reply that to write his life would be to trace the record of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and according to present indications, to write the history of the first quarter of the twentieth. It is the same old brazen note—but there's a crack in the bell.

"G. B. S."—whose initials have been translated as Gaelic brandy and soda—has had a very stimulating effect upon literature and the drama. Taking nothing seriously, including himself, he has always carried out the laugh. Now the master of the conversational drama sinks into moody monologue.

Mr. Shaw seems to realize that an American biography of him will not fail to attract attention. In fact, while Mr. Henderson has not been positively identified as the author of "Sassafras, O Sassafras," certain signs have pointed in that direction. The literary activities of North Carolina justify the prediction that a biography of Mr. Shaw would have all the tang of the pines, all the point of the pine needles. The great Irish dramatist already was sure of notoriety after death. An American Boswell will give him immortality.—Washington Times.
