FREIDELSON DISCUSSES LEWISON'S "UPSTREAM"

Former Editor of Wilmington Star Delivers a Significant Message to College Men Sunday.

"In a world so full of blatant dullness, vulgarity, ugliness and stupidity, in a world rejoicing in its chromos, jazz, yellow newspapers and sensational magazines, is there no need for an element of distinction which the college man ought to bring, the tradition, the idealism, the disinterested thought and knowledge which the college man ought to contribute?"

So said Professor Freidelson, head of the department of journalism in William and Mary College, and former editor of the Wilmington Star, speaking in the Presbyterian church Sunday night under the auspices of the Jewish students of the University, on "American Realists," based on Ludwig Lewison's "Upstream."

"I admit," said Mr. Freidelson, "that I began to read 'Upstream' with a feeling of hostility. I expected to find only the febrile protest of a man unfitted for his environment."

Declaring that he found much more in the book, the speaker continued: "We can overlook much unnecessary snarling and bitterness for the sake of flawless representation of our weaknesses. We can admire the brilliant style even when, as in the close, windiness seems to take the place of rich content."

Mr. Freidelson briefly sketched in a way most interesting to his audience the story of the German-American Jewish lad—his pride in his Anglo-Saxon heritage of literature and ideals, his struggles, his successes, and the disappointment which dogged his steps—told at length in Lewison's autobiography, "Upstream." He presented finally Lewison's "stimulating and dynamic indictment of our civilization, our art, our ideas, and our education."

"Humanity rises only as it loves the verities of human life and holds to the athletic thinking," said Mr. Freidelson. "Lewison found few college men who were dynamic users of knowledge, rather than absorbers of predigested information. He found them shallow, lacking in originality, in eagerness, in idealism. He found them thoughtlessly conforming to the popular opinion, and looking upon education merely as finer tools with which to conquer the material world and achieve temporal prosperity."

"If a college man," he said in conclusion, "is really what Lewison found him to be, then civilization is headed for disaster. Only as men throw aside narrowness, complacency, intolerance, colorless unanimity and selfish materialism, and seek from education a spiritual background by which to press forward for the ideal which ever moves ahead with the horizon, can humanity move slowly upstream toward the City of God."

HARLAND READS PAPER BEFORE PHILOLOGICAL CLUB

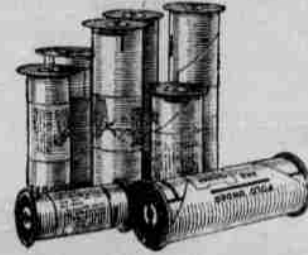

Prof. J. Penrose Harland, of the Greek department, read a paper on the Hellenic Civilization before the Philological Club at its Tuesday meeting. Professor Harland's paper covers one phase of his article in Harvard Studies. Another portion of this article appears in The American Journal of Archaeology as quoted from Professor Harland's paper, read last December at the annual meeting of the Archaeological Institute of America.

The lecture was illustrated by slides, and dealt for the most part with the excavations recently made by the American School at Zygouries.

These excavations bring to light the first early Hellenic settlement found on the mainland of Hellas, determine the plan and type of the early Hellenic house (E. H. P. ca. 2500-2000 B. C.) and indicate comparatively close cultural relationship between the mainland and the islands in the early Hellenic period. The evidence from the traditions and the dialectics pointed to this, and made it appear probable that at some time the southern part of Hellas had been inhabited by a non-Indo-European race that was akin to the Lykians of Asia Minor. The archaeological evidence both supplements this two-fold evidence and ties it up with the early Hellenic period.

RULES GOVERNING THE PRESTON PRIZE CUP

The following rules governing the Preston Cup Prize in Journalism have recently been given out:

1. The cup will be awarded annually to the undergraduate student who, during the months from September to May, has done the best work of a journalistic nature. (Note.—This clause will be interpreted as meaning work over an extended period of time, and while work written especially for this contest will not be ruled out, preference will be shown to that exhibit which has been the natural development of the year's work.)

2. Each year the name of the winner will be engraved upon the cup. Should it be won three times in succession by any student, it will become his property.

3. The nature of the work submitted will be determined by the following classifications: the student must submit material in each of the following three divisions: one entry must be made for each of the first two divisions (A and B); there may be one, two or three entries for the third division. In determining the award, the judges will give a weight of forty each to A and B and twenty points to division C.

(A) (a) Feature story, minimum 1,000 words; or

(b) News story; minimum 500 words.

(B) Editorial; (b) Book review; length, minimum 300 words.

(C) (a) Verse; (b) Sketches (descriptive or narrative). Length, no single entry to be over 400 words.

Note.—All material will be handed in to the member of the English department in charge of courses in journalism by May 1.

The original message of President Monroe, embodying the Monroe Doctrine, was found, together with many other valuable documents, in a basement room under the Capitol terrace. The valuable papers were packed away in a wooden file, partly rotted and covered with cobwebs. The original draft of the bill establishing the judiciary of the United States, a paper-backed volume in the handwriting of Samuel E. Otis, secretary of the first Senate, containing the only record of the enrolled bills presented in the first session of Congress, and a bill providing for the admission of Kentucky into the Union, were also found. Officials admit there are many other priceless documents decaying away in storage rooms, all legible but so brittle that pages break in handling.
