Carolina Cashes In: Visiting Prof Has High Praise For Students

By Al Harrison

Each Summer the University welcomes a host of visiting professors to the campus. This year the University of Florida's loss was Carolina's gain when Joe S. Floyd accepted an invitation to teach public finance during the first Summer Session.

The personable young professor might easily classify his Summer stint here as a homecoming since he began his teaching career on these grounds 10 years ago when the Navy V-12 program was underway.

"There is no other place like Chapel Hill," said Floyd. "It's hard to leave and it's great to return."

He has high praise for the new Business Administration buildings and expresses belief that they are the finest in the South.

"The only trouble I have is finding my way around Carroll Hall," he commented.

Floyd extended his praise to the students at UNC. He said, "The students here are of the highest quality to be found in most Southern institutions and it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to teach them."

In comparing the Chapel Hill of today with the one of 1943 he was quick to mention that the greatest change had been made in the expansion of grocery stores. Too, the modern Glen Lennox shopping district rated high in the list of more noticeable changes.

When asked if he had written a book recently, he pulled a book out of the shelf and said, "It's always nice to find your books in someone's office." The title of the book was Effects of Taxation on Industrial Location which was printed by the University Press. He has another book, Study of Economic Effects of Population Changes in the South, which is due to roll off of the presses in the Fall.

Floyd is modest about his ability to write books and insists that research is necessary for keeping up with things going on in the field one is teaching. He points out that continued interest and constructive thinking is much more important than getting a book published.

He summed up his attitude concerning publications by stating "there is too much worship of a hard cover book whereas there should be more emphasis on the quality than on the quantity".

Floyd is an avid baseball fan but finds it difficult to attend as many games as he wants due to his devotion to the teaching profession. He admits in a soft tone of voice that the Philadelphia Athletics have his moral support just as they did when he became wedded to them at an early age.

The amiable professor received his B. S. from the University of Florida and was awarded the M. A. and Ph.D in economics from the University of North Carolina.

Floyd is married and has two children. They are residing at 216 West University Drive during their stay in Chapel Hill.
