American Music Needs Leader Of Character Says Spalding

Noted Violinist Analyzes American Music, Pointing Out Its Faults And Its Possibilities, Explaining That Musical Progress Comes in Cycles and Today Is An Experimental Cycle.

The present tendency of American life towards too much sophistication has produced a detrimental effect on the quality of its folk songs, according to Albert Spalding, noted violinist and composer. "This sophistication," he stated in an interview yesterday afternoon, "is best noticed in a comparison with the simplicity of the folk songs of Ireland and Scotland."

He spoke easily and with a quiet assurance, hesitating only as he inhaled deeply from his cigarette. A few moments before, upon being ushered into the room, the reporter had been surprised to find a tall, dark man dressed in a neat, well-cut morning suit. His arms were long and his hands large, yet withal he possessed a surprising grace and poise. His slender fingers held the delicate movements of the artist. As he spoke, his voice was low and his eyes wandered slowly about the room.

Simplicity Wanted

"American composers," he said, placing his coffee cup on the tray and leaning back in his chair, "have dressed up their songs with ginger bread and smoothed off the rough edges, but the rough edges are what we desire in the folk song. The power of native music lies in getting it as near as possible from the soil. It has its greatest influence unadorned, and loses much of its character and meaning when decorated."

On the whole the work of American composers has had little effect upon the music of the world, in the opinion of Spalding. Although the compositions of Sousa, Victor Herbert and others have undeniably been of merit, they have not been sufficient to give America a place beside the homes of Bach and Beethoven.

"The contribution of America to the field of music has been little," he went on. "One must not, however, take this rather pessimistic statement too seriously. The years of America's history do not lie in a period that saw musical progress in any country. They were the barren years of creative music. Musical progress comes in cycles. We are at present in the midst of an experimental cycle, and little contemporary music is of an enduring quality."

Russians and Americans

Turning in his discussion to the question of the modern Russian composers, he drew a striking analogy between the development of slavish music and the present American musical situation, pointing out the possibilities for our future progress. "Russian music," he said, pausing a moment to light another cigarette while he gathered his thoughts, "has become popular during the last twenty-five years. Previous to that time she was as America, wading through a period of experimentation. For the most part her folk music was of an imported variety, and her symphonic music dominated entirely by Germany. It was not until
