In his address tomorrow afternoon Judge Winston will deal with the biography of Lee and some of the allied subjects including myths about the famous general that have been created and destroyed. The speaker will discuss much of the source material for the biography and his methods of obtaining it, touching also on political and other errors about Lee that he has found in his researches.

Two Duke Co-eds 'Obey An Impulse'

There was great excitement in the lower quadrangle yesterday afternoon, when two Duke co-eds, here for the afternoon, marched determinedly to the third floor of one of the dorms, with the avowed intention of "getting back those pictures."

Consternation ruled the roost, as the two stoical femmes ran the length of the hall to the desired room. Heads peered from doors, startled howls were heard, the shower room door was slammed hurriedly, shutting off the cloud of steam that had emanated from its innards.

Down in the car which had transported our fair ladies from Durham waited the two whose rooms were being pilfered. They had laughingly given keys to their rooms, stating that if the girls had the nerve to go up, they could take anything they found.

And they took plenty. To the accompaniment of a salvo of applause, they came out laden with pictures, tie clasps, and even a tiny white ivory elephant that had formerly perched on a Carolina dresser.

The sad thing about it was, that as soon as the girls got down stairs, the surprised inhabitants of the rooms took it all away again. They, nor anyone else, thought that the dare would be accepted.

When they were last seen, our two fair adventuresses were making their way homeward, each with no more than she had brought, and each one as scared as two exploring co-eds can be.
