PARAGRAPHS

Now that Siberian gold is coming into the United States, we'll have to give Russia credit for a good idea.

Extension Work Goes Forward

The effectiveness of the work of R. M. Grumman and the extension division of the University is clearly evident in the figures on extension work released Thursday, which showed an increase of 278 students over the same period last year. These classes, which are primarily for public school teachers, are scattered throughout North Carolina. The greater part of the teaching is done by five full-time extension instructors located in fourteen towns selected as centers of instruction. These instructors are aided by nine University professors and one from Duke.

The greater part of this increase is accounted for by the fact that the extension division is making a special effort to co-operate with the state department of education and the county units in the study and improvement of their curriculum. Since the revision of education in the state, whereby the state takes over all educational units in order to guarantee a more general level of educational excellence, the extension division has included classes which go hand and hand with the study program carried on by the department of education and the schools.

A significant feature in this year's work of the extension department is the co-operation of Duke University in making Professor J. S. Bradway available for extension work. While he is teaching only one class, it is the beginning of co-operative extension work between the two universities, by which the two extension departments hope to enlarge their field of activity.

With the revision of state education, teachers in some of the smaller communities are working on an increased salary, enabling them to enroll in extension classes, for which a regular $15 fee is charged. While this money was available last year, the fact that the extension division has constructed its classes to fit in with the state education program has undoubtedly persuaded a comparatively large number of these teachers in the small communities to enroll in classes.

At present, the extension division is reaching mainly secondary school teachers, the emphasis having been placed in this direction for several years. Mr. Grumman and his staff are serving a definite purpose in providing for the professional growth of teachers, endeavoring to reach and improve those teachers now working in state schools by providing an "in-service teacher training." However, of the 45 classes offered, only three are not constructed for teachers; the ratio seems top-heavy. The program seems to be submerged in teaching teachers.

When a greater share of the emphasis is placed on enrolling others than teachers, then the extension division will be performing a more generally far reaching work.

A Lay Contest

Whether Beta beats Snake to meet Law, or Snake beats Beta, one thing is certain; the winner of the final in the intramural football league is going to be a stellar grid aggregation, judging from the standard of play in the dormitory and fraternity loops this fall.

We hear that over in Duke they have some crack tag footballers in their intramural competition. What could be more logical, as a continuation of healthy relations with our Durham rival, than a tilt between the championship teams of both schools, or, to make it twice as good, a double-header between the respective dormitory and fraternity winners?

The mammoth tennis meets between the two schools were an immense success; such campus-to-campus competition fosters the finest type of good feelings. This fall the trend has definitely swung toward better feelings even in the heat of the annual Duke-Carolina football game. Nothing could more firmly cement these relations than an undergraduate "lay contest" between the gridsters of the two institutions.

Exemptions or Examinations?

Seniors at State College this week adopted a resolution to petition the Faculty Council to exempt all seniors with a B average from all quarterly examinations. This move is being advocated by student leaders who feel that it will be effective in raising the scholastic average by encouraging them to raise their daily grades.

The exemption plan has several aspects, which present both sides of the question. On the surface it would seem that exemptions might serve as an incentive to students to keep their daily averages up to the required exemption standard; however, in those places in which the plan has been tried with subsequent failure, it is claimed that the average student is so constituted that he believes in letting matters slide as long as possible. This obviously denies the tenet that holding up the plum of exemption greatly influences the student. Furthermore, professors claim the real purpose of examinations is to furnish the student an adequate review of the course and to fix its essentials in his mind.

On the other hand, students who have prepared their work and assimilated it as it was presented to them that some reward is due them, that examinations are an unnecessary burden. They claim that examinations frequently destroy a whole quarter's work by catching the student in an off day, or by the inclusion of obscure questions.

Students and governing bodies will always be at odds on this problem. The adoption of either system will present certain disadvantages.

Hearst and The Boys

The answer of William Randolph Hearst to an open letter sent him by the Association of College Editors was a most farcical generalization evading every specific issue set forth in the nine questions which the college editors set down. It was a generalization such as most eminent international authorities spout forth, with the result that nobody understands nor gives a continental what the big fellows are talking about.

But college men the nation over in this instance care a great deal about Hearst's evasions, because they were such gross examples of misplacement of the faith of our people. Theorizing in platitudinous generalizations, Mr. Hearst did a noble job of saying absolutely nothing in a great many words on international policy.

Hearst, the man with the newspapers, is a menace to those "people who think" to whom he claims he appeals. His dodging of the issues places him on the "pedestal" as America's False God Number One.

Private Diplomacy

George Herman Ruth is a private diplomat of the first rank. The big Bambino, Sultan of Swat, invades foreign territory with a hefty bat and an unbeatable grin, and men, hero-worshippers and sports lovers that they are, fall at his feet.

A recent photograph by the United Press pictures the mighty Ruth standing and waving his hat from an automobile to a wildly cheering crowd on the streets of Tokyo. Small American flags are seen in the hands of some of the Japs in the foreground. Whether consciously or unconsciously, the Babe is doing a great job of improving relations between the two nations, for he represents America personified to most of the frantic mob that comes to see him swat the onion.

We become interested in the comparison of the Bambino's work on the Jap's good feelings and the ambassadors' efforts to keep things under control between the two nations. Whereas the diplomats with the white collars are technicians, the big Babe is an informal, straight-from-the-shoulder appeal artist. What Jap can care whether his fatherland is allowed a ten thousand ton battleship or not, when he's watching the Sultan of Swat swing the wood? We wager he'd be just as satisfied with a canoe.

POLICE OFFICIALS TO MAKE PROBE

(Continued from page one) and the "D.D.D.," offer chances to the local townspeople and students at odds ranging from 7 to 1, to 50 to 1, on picking the winners of football games. The price of a card is from 25 cents "on up." The buyer makes his selections from the list of eight games on the card, the more games picked the greater the odds received if all the teams win their games on the following Saturday.

All the teams picked must win, however, or the buyer loses his chance. Ties, unless predicted, are considered losses for the buyer.
