FERA Directors Require U.S. Colleges To Revise Student Work Projects

Washington Officials Wish to Improve "Social" Value of Present Jobs.

Following suggestions from the educational division of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, all colleges in the United States will reconsider their FERA student work projects within the next few weeks to determine their "social" value.

The administration at Washington feels that part of the projects now included in the list of work being done by college students receiving federal aid is without this "social" value.

According to Edwin S. Lanier, local FERA director for students, the continuation of federal aid for students in 1935-36 depends to a great extent on the revision of project lists which is being carried out through the country this month.

Over 125 representatives from North Carolina colleges considered the administration's suggestions at the Woman's College of the University Tuesday and urged colleges in the state to strive to discover and develop work projects thoroughly social and desirable and to maintain high scholastic requirements for FERA students.

Lanier declared that he thought most of the projects being done by Carolina FERA students are desirable and would meet all government expectations. However, he felt that possibly 15 per cent of the total work could be improved upon to make all student work here "social" in nature.

Bond New Manager

Niles W. Bond, University sophomore from Lexington, Mass., was selected by the Publications Union Board yesterday to succeed Bernard Solomon as business manager of the Finjan.

Solomon will resign at the end of this quarter in order to take a position elsewhere. His resignation will leave two issues for which Bond will be the temporary business manager.

Bond has served on the business staff of the Daily Tar Heel and the Finjan.
