Passion Play

never be assigned to members of one family, Miss Rutz's sister was given the role of King Solomon's bride in the tableau of the Song of Solomon.

The speaker told of how a great plague visited the village of Oberammergau in 1433. For weeks the church bells tolled constantly, until at last they had announced the death of a tenth of the 850 people in the village. At last the townspeople assembled in the church and prayed that the plague be taken from them.

Prayer

If God would remove the cause of their people's death they vowed to enact the passion of the Lord every ten years as long as the village stood as a thanksgiving to God for relieving them. From that hour no one in the village died of the plague, and since that day the people have presented their Lord's Passion every ten years. For nine years they till their fields and ply their trades, but when the tenth year comes the whole community turns its thoughts to the Passion play.

Beards

In January of the year in which the play is to be given, an order goes out from the town council that all men in the town must allow their hair and beards to grow. Frequently maidens visiting the town for the first time are somewhat surprised by the sight of wild uncouth faces peering at them in the village streets. When the men have at length grown their beards and long hair, they do manage to look very handsome with waving hair about their shoulders.

The production calls for many expensive and brilliant costumes. The robes of the high priest Annas were brought from Persia, and cost over six hundred dollars. Pilate's dress is richly embroidered with gold thread, and oriental fabrics from the far east are used in many of the robes. The whole outlay costs about one half million dollars. Any money left over after all expenses are paid is divided among the players. No make-up, false hair, or electric lights are used in the play, the players depending purely on the sincerity with which they play their parts for the effect.

Election

Months of preparation, careful selection and election of the characters by the council, and painful play rehearsal, often in a stage deep in snow result at last in the Passion play. When the bells of Whitsuntide sound across the valley of Oberammergau, the play is ready for presentation. Summer long the play, lasting seven hours, is given for a vast stream of travelers. In the past two performances, the 1930 and 1934 seasons, 155 performances of the play were given. And after the summer is over, the people of the village go back to their woodcutting and farming till the nine years shall have passed and they may again fulfill their vow.

Miss Rutz's lecture was well received by an audience of about 240 people. Her slight German accent did not detract from her speaking and her Bavarian costume added color to the lecture. Her slides were of scenes from the Passion play, the cloud capped mountains overshadowing the village, and the river valleys, and last, the final scene of the play, with a fiery sunset in the sky behind.

Talk Of The Town

Just above is a significant moment in Columbia's picturization of George Kelly's stirring Pulitzer Prize play, "Craig's Wife," showing today at the Carolina theatre. Rosalind Russell, who plays the title role, and John Boles, who is seen as Craig, are discussing a highly disturbing situation in which they find themselves. Billie Burk, Jane Darwell and others are featured in the film.

Beale said, "Generally speaking, American teachers don't have any social philosophy and don't see any real need for freedom." Touching on the supervision exercised over teachers in regard to subjects discussed by them in classrooms, Professor Beale said, "The biggest problem I find is in discovering what indoctrination means and what teaching means."

The historian touched on the strained relations between white and colored pupils and teachers in some localities. Illustrations were taken from actual incidents in northern and southern schools that bear directly on the most perplexing parts of this problem.

Preceding the speaker's address, organization business was acted on and committee reports read.

Immediately following the business of the organization, 24 new candidates were accepted into membership and given a short address on the origin and principles of the sociological fraternity by Dr. Lee M. Brooks, faculty adviser for the body. Welcoming the new members into the association Dr. Brooks said, "We stand for scholarship, effort and service."

Art Exhibit

ancient spreading trees on an arid plain.

City Streets

From New York craftsmen come several realistic lithographs. "First Offender" represents a court room scene with faces somewhat in the vein of Hoff. "Discarded" is a pattern in black and white—a junk heap. "Cafeteria" presents a scene filled with drab, drooping people—a young, weary, white-faced girl seated with an older man of doubtful character. In "Tony's Place" may be seen people with tired, drawn faces, typical of the individuals on New York streets.

The artists whose work is represented here are not trying to interpret any great message. They merely depict life about them as they see it. The exhibit therefore contains a few pictures with animation and individuality and an acute feeling for the contemporary scene.

The pictures will be on display until December 1.

and guidance and sound information for the collector. The whole is written in a very humorous vein and is profusely illustrated.

"End Papers" is a collection of essays and short articles on books, also very delightfully and entertainingly written. It is conversational in tone and supplemented with very amusing pictures and caricatures.

"Primer of Book Collecting" is good for the beginner in the field. This is of a more serious nature but is interesting and profitable reading. It has a wealth of references and illustrations.

It is the mark of good action that it appears inevitable in the retrospect.—R. L. Stevenson.
