• Only Listeners

The luxury of suspended ideas and the difficulty of the action necessary to their enforcement was clearly illustrated Thursday night in the Human Relations Institute's debate on education. Audiences attending the programs on International Relations, The South, or Business and Industry were able to enjoy the privilege of individual solutions to the world's problems. The debate on education, however, brought one of the largest dilemmas directly home, where the practical success the institute might have been proven by action growing out of the convictions of the audience.

The two speakers, Scott Buchanan and John Rice, were radicals in their field. Buchanan, dean of Saint John's college, institutional child of Hutchins' theory, advised a return to classicism. Rice, leader in the Black Mountain college experiment in progressive education, spoke for the totalitarian, or whole, man as the citizen of democracy.

Out of the two opposing viewpoints will grow the future of American education, claimed Dean Bradshaw in his introduction of the speakers. The large audience enjoyed Rice's sense of humor, if they did not unconditionally adopt his convictions. They listened attentively to Buchanan and applauded both men long enough for each to acknowledge the audience's enthusiasm more than once.

Dr. I. L. Kandel, of the Columbia university school of education, was invited by Dean Bradshaw to offer, as an expert, the synthesis of the two viewpoints. Although Kandel won the respect of his audience, they enjoyed Rice's remark that he was a "bad teacher" and that the trouble with writers of text books on education was that they were "so damned ignorant." Kandel talked about education, but it was the canned brand that has grown out of the old system.

A forum of thirty or more students and faculty gathered around Buchanan and Rice after the debate in Memorial hall. They were not so much interested in disagreeing with the speakers as they were in finding out what might be done to lift the University of North Carolina out of its academic quagmire of educational stagnation. Rice pointed out that the hands of the interested members of the faculty were tied. A student revolution was his only answer.

Although Dean House's point cannot be ignored: that common sense must not be forgotten in the whirl of theories, evidence for the support of Rice's and Buchanan's positions are apparent all around us, so close that they are not easy to see. The curriculum is standardized, readmissions are rigid with rules, grades have become the object of learning, students do not like to go to classes, and professors unentangled in the red take of procedure are necessarily rare. Modern education is not "Education for the Individual," but rather for economic, biological, psychological, or sociological man. Emerson's "American Scholar" is real only to those who transcend the system.

The greatest tragedy at home, however, is that the members of the faculty and student body who are sanely anxious to consider a gradual program of change will—as products of the old system—stand and wait for Time to do it all.

To Tell The Truth

By ADRIAN SPIES

A supremely pungent comment upon the mental state of our American politicians was unwittingly made yesterday morning after a talk by Congressman T. V. Smith. After applauding generously, a student turned to his friend: "Say, that man's really not a congressman is he? He's too-damned smart for that."

We have become so accustomed to expect bulldozing verbosity and stupid sentimentality from our duly elected and appointed national officers that any signs of intellect amaze us. And because we have a tradition of tolerant acceptance of inefficient government in America, we can joke about things and forget them. Anyone with a ten gallon hat or an ability to misinterpret statistics can go to Washington. And it is only when he gives signs of really knowing government when we raise our heads and act surprised.

There has already been much written about the inaptness of this country in training intelligent young people for politics. Every year the cream of the energetic and promising crop of college seniors compete with each other for a diminishing number of jobs in private industry. It is rare when anyone but a promoted ward healer or an established politician's satellite sets out to make public administration his career.

It is significant and pleasing in this light to notice that at least one group in America has realized our need for capable government workers and has done a little something about it. The group is The National Institute of Public Affairs. Recently organized by a number of influential men in government and business, it offers to fifty college graduates each year an opportunity to secure a year's training for administration in Washington. And although this is a pitifully small number, it represents—with the exception of American and George Washington Universities—the only work of this sort being done.

The fifty students are chosen from the entire country and are consistently outstanding men and women upon their camp. They are given an "internship" in all governmental posts but the state department, usually working as personal assistants to the heads of different federal agencies. Although in the majority of the cases the young people receive no salary and have to support themselves in Washington, they occupy surprisingly important posts. And they of course have a year in which to study the machinery of the various departments.

At the end of each year, the fifty students usually are presented with the choice of either going into private business or remaining in Washington in a more official capacity. There is, however, no regular guarantee of such positions. The student must, in other words, "produce."

The Institute itself is non-partisan, and seems to be fairly free from the usual Washington bureaucratic hogfishness. Voit Gilmore—who is one of the students to have received an appointment, although he has not definitely decided to accept it—says that the Institute "marks the first act of thinking and benevolent business men to bridge the gap of college theory and administrative reality, the idea being to take young people and give them a practical training in administration." Other than allowing the students to work in important offices and divisions, the federal administrators have nothing to do with the work.

Other local students besides Gilmore who have received these "scholarships" are Phil Hammer and Alex Heard. Hammer was particularly fortunate to have become secretary to Senator La Follette, and to have worked with him upon the Civil Liberties Committee.

This briefly describes the work of one isolated group which has realized a very pertinent problem. It obviously is not copious enough to have an important effect upon the standard of American administrators. But it is a commendable example and precedent from which a really important civil service training school could be founded. And if you have ever been to the capitol in Washington and heard some of the esteemed legislators in action you are aware of the timeliness of such a proposition.

That student was right in being able to believe that such an intelligent man as T. V. Smith was actually in politics. He is one of the few exceptions which prove a lamentable and ludicrous rule.

Things I Never Knew And Still Dunno (But Which You Knew All Along)

THAT THE TABLETS in Memorial hall were placed there gratis by the University in order to honor properly its famous sons . . . If on this Easter some not-yet-grown-up couldn't arrange a good old-fashioned egg hunt in the arboretum . . . Just how Bill Pearson—if elected—plans to go about putting a co-ed on the student council and giving the students a campus movie, an idea the proposal of which was declared impractical a long time ago . . . How Walter Skidmore plans to make a fortune in the coal mining business . . . Why Simons Roof doesn't get a haircut . . . That the Phi Beta Kappa men do not always represent the choice intellects of this institution.

WHY CHAPEL HILL is one of the most torrid spots in the entire state during the summer . . . That the dog in "Hound of the Baskervilles" this week was a 140-lb. Great Dane, which won the role by looking more ferocious than his 143 costers . . . Veteran Noosepaperman H. E. C. (Red Buck) Bryant will return to his alma mater for a visit within the next few weeks . . . That those members of the opposite sex who love to sound out on that screwy ditty, "Hold Tight," would blush vermilion if they knew what those words in the song meant . . . Why James McConaughy of Ohio this week returned to the scene of the crime many villagers thought he committed a few years ago when he penned "Village Chronicle," a novel the scene of which was laid in Chapel Hill . . . Guess everybody's cooled off now.

WHETHER ALLEN GREEN'S all-fiction Carolina Mag for April will be perused more thoroughly than previous issues, which contained so many articles the stories were overshadowed by the impact of sociology themes . . . That there never be a surplus of cotton in this state if all those people who can't stand to listen to commercial plugs on their radios bought five cents worth of cotton to stuff in their ears . . . That Librarian Carl White tries "to have only the highest type of person working in the stacks" . . . Why some proffs apparently never want to let you go, and others dismiss you before the bell even rings . . . The sign on the Pick box office: "This is a second run picture. No refunds." . . . Silly, ain't it? . . . That the best man is always elected to office by the student vote.

THE NEGRO WHO WAS jailed for non-payment of an accumulation of court charges, consequently becoming the new jail's first inmate, has been convicted of everything from chicken stealing to snitching a license plate off a hearse . . . Judge Phipps said in court Tuesday: "I have a soft spot for Guthrie. He was my first client when I began practicing law—and I lost the case." . . . Chamberlain's umbrella was fourteen years old . . . Before this University can reach a stage of perpetual development, all campus politicians will have to be taken out somewhere and shot down like dogs . . . That the Playmaker's presentation of Wilder's "Our Town," next week will be the first time the play has been produced by an amateur group of thespians.

AT THE OPENING of the Civil War the student body enlisted en masse and marched off with the president at their head . . . That proffs prefer tried-and-true jokes to so-called new ones . . . That 98 per cent of the faculty members belong to some church, but that only 20 per cent attend . . . That the Di and Phi are capable of intelligent deliberation and weighty decisions . . . That Martin Harmon is holding his own . . . That the value of a textbook bought from the Book-Ex has decreased about 90 per cent when you return it for a reimbursement . . . That there have been a number of suicides on this institution—three attempts this year.
