

'SKIPPER'

dark room, Miller boasted of secretly catching what seemed to be the first man of the nation off guard, in the University journalism department. Seehriest and the eight future photographers all agreed that "it" looked like Truman.

However, when Skipper saw the picture, the first thing he thought of, he said, was a ground puppy. Skipper explained that this animal was a kind of salamander which has no facial expression.

Phillipa Russell, another journalism professor, said it resembled a surface minnow coming up for air.

Mahatma Gandhi?

Skipper's wife, playwright Gertrude Coffin, insisted that the shot of her husband resembled the President; but the Coffin's maid, Earline, topped all other exclamations by likening it to "dat little' colored man dat don't wear nuttin' but hippings!", referring to Mahatma Gandhi in his diaper-like apparel.

"But it's a good picture," Assistant Professor Seehriest insisted, "because you can see every thread in that 10-year-old suit that Skipper's wearing."

So the feud continues and the debated picture hangs unlabeled in the news photography class exhibit in Byrum hall, waiting for a decision to be reached.
