

Enraged Georgia Citizens Say Both Governors Used Bribery

Group Demands Grand Jury Investigations; State Bogging Down in Financial Troubles

Atlanta, Jan. 25—(UP)—The possibility of new legal complications in the Georgia governorship tangle was raised tonight by a group of aroused citizens. The group, which calls itself just that, the Aroused Citizens of Georgia, is demanding a grand jury investigation. It charges that both sides, the factions led by both Melvin Thompson and Herman Talmadge, tried to bribe members of the general assembly at the time the assembly elected a governor.

The organization is headed by a civic official, Mayor Harvey Kennedy of Barnesville, Ga.

Shamed and Humiliated

Says Kennedy: "The people of Georgia are shamed and humiliated over the charges made by members of the general assembly that bribes were offered by both sides."

The demand for an investigation brought differing reactions from the contending governors. Thompson says he'd welcome such an investigation. Says he: "The public is entitled to know about it—it should be either proved or disproved." Talmadge, however, had no comment to make.

State Bogging

Meanwhile, the state is bogging down in financial troubles.

It faces a partial financial breakdown within a week if the deadlock isn't broken by then. State records indicate that six agencies will run out of funds by next Saturday.

Weston Pictures Are On Exhibition At Person Gallery

Being shown in Person art gallery now in a large exhibit of 259 photographs by Edward Weston, noted American photographer. These include camera satires, portraits, and photographs of nudes and cats.

Weston, who will be 60 years old in March, first started taking pictures at the age of 16, when his father gave him a camera as a present. The sale to a magazine of one of his pictures, a landscape, convinced him that photography was to be his life's work.

In 1937 he became the first photographer to receive a Guggenheim fellowship, which he used to make a series of photographic documents of the West. This was his first chance in 26 years to concentrate on the type of work he was personally interested in.

In 1941 Weston was asked to photograph American scenes to illustrate an edition of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." The trip was not completed due to the advent of the United States into World War II, but he returned to his home in Carmel, California, where he concentrated his work on his large group of pet cats. These pictures, which are among those on exhibit, are described as "... an amusing series—and a photographic achievement."

Not Even a Cigar Store Indian...

Mail Order Collegians Work Toward Degree By University's Correspondence Courses

By Raney Stanford

No Indian chief is listed, but just about every other occupation mentioned in the familiar nursery rhyme is engaged in by the 840 people who took over 1,000 correspondence courses through the Extension division last year. Farmers, merchants, industrial workers, engineers, scientists, even an aerologist at Operations Crossroads and a test pilot used their spare time to take one or more of the 150 subjects given by the University through the mails.

Mary L. Cobb, head of the Bureau of Correspondence Instruction, in a report surveying the Bureau's work during the past year, stated that 80 counties of North Carolina, 28 other states, and seven foreign countries were represented in the roster of students.

Credit Toward Degree

The majority of the mail-order collegians took courses to get credit toward a college degree, but many were teachers who were becoming qualified for teaching certificates. And still others took work just for the sake of learning. A wife of an American officer, stationed in Austria, finished one of her courses by mail after she had dropped out of school to join her husband. A manager of a book shop took a course in children's literature so that he might select children's books more intelligently. One housewife signed up for a course in short story writing and won the Joseph Caldwell cup, given by the Federation of Women's Clubs of North Carolina, for one of her stories.

Difficulties of all sorts were experienced by students in squeezing their scholastic work into whatever free moments they could find. A public accountant wrote the bureau: "The conditions under which I have been (and shall continue, I imagine) studying have been annoying. I have four hours a day to read (while on the train) but only a few a week for writing. I travel 125 miles a day back and forth to work in New York and don't get home until after 8 at night—giving me little time to myself, seeing as how I get up at 5:30. I've heard a rumor there is a housing shortage—as if I didn't know."

Homework on a Transport

A serviceman in the Navy told of the hardships involved in completing assignments aboard a rolling, tossing troop transport in the middle of the Pacific ocean.

No Great Decline

In concluding and summing up her report, Miss Cobb says: "When colleges are full, as at present, we cannot expect as large an enrollment of correspondence students as otherwise, but we find that there will not be a great decline during the coming year, for there will still be many persons unable to attend college and desiring to study."

Traffic Engineers to Meet At Institute Here this Week

A Traffic Engineering institute will be conducted by the University's Institute of Government for state and city officials responsible for traffic engineering and management at the Institute building here today through next Thursday, it was announced today by Albert Coates, Director. Registration is scheduled from 5 to 7 o'clock this afternoon.

Another institute, a City Street Superintendent school, will be conducted by the Institute of Government for city officials responsible for the construction and maintenance of streets, beginning at 1 o'clock Thursday, and continuing through Friday afternoon, Mr. Coates said.

The State Highway and Public Works commission and the Yale University Bureau of Highway Traffic are joining with the Institute in conducting the Traffic Engineering institute which is designed to help traffic officials deal with current problems arising out of increasing traffic and increasing speeds, parking, and traffic violations. The Highway commission is also aiding in conducting the City Street Superintendents School.

Clifford Pace, Assistant Director of the Institute of Government, is in charge of local arrangements.
