Tuition Protests Are Mailed By Council To All Solons

Resolution Hits Trustees' Action In $69 Increase

By Sam McKeel
The Student Council of the Greater University announced today that it had mailed copies of a resolution to each member of the legislature and to the governor strongly protesting the action taken by the Board of Trustees in the recent tuition hike.

This action of the board came after Governor Scott had recommended to the board that the tuition should be raised. The subsequent passing of the measure, calling for a $69 raise, brought the wrath of students from all three branches of the University on the legislature, the Governor and the board of Trustees. A flood of letters erupted from the campus at Chapel Hill, while petitions circulated at both State and Woman's college.

The Student Council, after a thorough investigation, decided to go on record as being against the measure.

The resolution mailed to the legislators and the Governor said, "the Student Council of the Greater University of North Carolina strongly protests the action of the Board of Trustees in raising the tuition at the three branches of the Greater University because:

1. It will deprive many young people of the opportunity for a higher education.
2. It indicates a lack of appreciation for the democratic principles of public education and a complete disregard of the welfare of the youth of North Carolina.
3. The increase is an unjustified tax upon those who are less equipped to pay.

Weaver Urges Dorm Unity At IDC Meet

First Annual Banquet Held

Dean of Students Fred H. Weaver urged "a closer unity in dormitory life" in his address to some 45 members and guests attending the first annual Men's and Women's Inter-Dormitory council banquet Monday night in the Carolina inn.

The speaker said that dormitory residents should have "a sense of belonging to their respective dormitories where there should be a sort of brotherhood." He continued that a fraternity house is based on brotherhood while a dormitory is "just a place to live."

In contrasting dormitory life with that of the fraternity, Dean Weaver said that both were necessary to college life, and that "no one should drive a wedge between them" whether it be in campus politics, social life, or scholastic standing.

While commending both dormitory councils for their efforts to improve the living conditions, he named two main goals for which the councils should aim: First, he said that there should be "the same kind of autonomy in dormitories as there is in fraternities." Second, he called for the eventual initiation of the "house plan."

Expanding upon the "house plan" idea, Weaver said that dormitories came closest to that goal in 1935 when the first inter-dormitory council was formed. He said that at that time men paid a $1 social fee which paid for radios and other furnishings in the social rooms of the men's dormitories (now used as living quarters). Speaking of present conditions, Dean Weaver said that "the university should and must improve facilities of the dormitories."

Pete Gerns, president of the Men's IDC, presided at the banquet. He called upon Sue Stokes, president of the women's council, to recognize representatives of the women's dormitories which led in campus activities. Gerns recognized the men.
