

Carolina Delegates Back From Conference; Learn How To Further World Enlightenment

"This conference has the double purpose of extending enlightenment in our own land about world affairs and the human beings who comprise other lands and of probing the ways to more effective influence in the world agencies in which our nation participates," said Dr. Ordway Tead, opening the third national conference of the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO, held in New York City January 27-31.

The conference was attended by Mel Stribling, Bill Wolf, Ken Penegar, Henry Bowers and Dick Murphy. Murphy, former attorney general for the Carolina student body and now a graduate student in history, was chairman of the youth section of the conference and head of the Carolina delegation.

Walter Spearman, professor of the School of Journalism, Russell M. Grumman, director of the Extension Division were also delegates to the conference.

During a busy five days the delegates were addressed by such prominent and well-informed speakers as George D. Stoddard, chairman of the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO, Jaime Torres Bodet, director general of UNESCO; Reinhold Niebuhr, vice-chairman, U.S. National Commissioner for UNESCO; Frederick S. Dunn, of Princeton University; and Elmer Davis.

"We are now in a period when the most desirable solution of the overriding problem of time—that is, a working out of our antagonism with Russia without a shooting war—and without appeasement—that best hope that we have will entail a long period of tension, during which the American people will have to display a patience they have never had to acquire before. And for the working out of the even longer-term problems of UNESCO we work in the dark, in the hope that the results may be apparent to our grandchildren, or descendants still more remote," said Davis.

The first two days of the conference were devoted to a series of panel discussions and the last three days were spent in workshop groups. Special meetings included "Visual Arts and UNESCO," "UNESCO and the Theatre," "The UN and Writing for the Future Generation." Panel presentations included "American Attitude on Foreign Affairs," "The Mass Media and Community Education," and "Bridge and Barrier: Cultures and Languages."
