Telegraph Company Opens Office Here

Western Union Officials Operate Without Striking Employees; Local Picket Likely

By Bob Slough

The Chapel Hill Western Union office reopened yesterday afternoon but union employees involved in the two-week walkout refused to return to work.

W. H. Stanley, Greensboro office manager sent to Chapel Hill to reopen the local office, said, "We (the company) are reopening more offices everyday, and in North Carolina now have more than 160 points from which messages can be sent and received."

The Western Union telegraphers, messengers and clerks, all members of the Commercial Telegrapher's Union of the AF of L have been on strike since April 2. The employees walked out after failing to reach an agreement with company officials on "higher wages, a 40-hour week, and other demands," as Stanley put it.

Stanley said he would remain here "until later in the afternoon when C. T. Bolick will take charge of the office." Bolick is former manager of the Western Union office here.

The Chapel Hill employees involved in the nation-wide strike are Miss Claudia Cannady, office manager, and two telegraphers, Mrs. Lucille Ayers, and Mrs. Muriel Waters.

Miss Cannady said late yesterday afternoon that a "picket line" will probably be formed at the office, but the Chapel Hill staff will take no part in the movement.

Stanley came to Chapel Hill early yesterday morning and contacted Miss Cannady who opened the office and transferred the funds. "We then reopened the circuit and started operating," Stanley said. The office will open at 9 o'clock each morning.

Meanwhile, Western Union officials claimed they had reopened more than 1,000 offices throughout the nation and could now handle as much as 65% of the work being done before the walkout. "Back-to-work movements in many other cities have begun," company officials said.
