Truman Violated Moral Right

tion of Powers: Judicial, Executive and Legislative branches are endowed with equal power, none capable of directly limiting actions of the others.

He pointed out that, while the framers of the Constitution clearly set forth this idea of equal authority, "the majority of the people have consistently supported an increase in the powers of the Presidency, often at the expense of the powers of Congress."

"I do not think," Woodhouse continued, "that the Supreme Court or any other authority except the people of the United States can give the President orders or interfere in any way with the actions of the President save by some authority clearly given in the Constitution."

"I would agree with Professor Corwin of Princeton that Congress may use its power over appropriations and any other clear Constitutional grants of power in order to check the President, even in his exercise of his Constitutional powers."

"The President may be mistaken in his decision as to the advisability of his using in this case his Constitutional powers," Dr. Woodhouse concluded, "but I think he clearly has the power to seize the steel factories as he has done and that Congress can check him in such action only as indicated above."

Dr. Monroe took a somewhat different position and referred particularly to Article V of the Amendments to the Constitution under which no person shall "be deprived of . . . property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." "This article," he said, "is expressly designed to limit the President."

Dr. Monroe said, "We must of course judge the extensiveness of the protection afforded by the Bill of Rights in terms of the acknowledged powers of the President to provide for the public safety during wartime. I think the President is exceeding his moral authority in taking over the steel industry."

He quoted from Act IV of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice where Bassanio advised Portia, "Wrest once the law to your authority: To do a great right, do a little wrong." Portia's reply was, "It must not be; 'twill be recorded for a precedent, and many an error by the same example will rush into the state."

This reporter is reminded of something another character of Shakespeare's said: "But in these nice sharp quillets of the law, good faith, I am no wiser than a daw."
