Faculty Freedom Surveyed

Ninety-nine percent of 198 University instructors think the faculty should encourage discussion of current social issues in their classes when relevant to the course work.

In a faculty questionnaire designed to provide some factual basis for the current discussion of academic freedom on the campus, eighty-three percent of the faculty members questioned approve of the requirement of the oath of allegiance to the state and national constitutions, of all new faculty since 1941.

The survey was conducted by Jack Phillips and Wyman Richardson, graduate students here. Questionnaires were sent to all of the faculty—some 600—but only 198 answered the forms.

As for discussion outside the classroom only 33 percent of the faculty members questioned think they are now expressing their opinions on current social issues more than three years ago. Forty-eight percent feel their discussion is the same while 12½ feel there is more discussion outside the classroom.

When asked if they approve of the inclusion of the "Communist affiliations" question on the University personnel forms, 105 faculty members answered yes, 68 said no, and nine were undecided.

Other questions included: Do you feel to express your views publicly on the following issues would harm your relations with the University Administration (answer yes, slightly, or no) (a) U. S. foreign policy, (b) Federal aid to education (c) Negro segregation (d) McCarthy's charges. Forty said yes; 26 said slightly, and 106 said no.

Do you think the results of this questionnaire will accurately reflect the attitude of the faculty toward the state of academic freedom on the campus at the present time? Sixty-nine said yes; sixty-six said no, and 40 were undecided.

Phillips and Richardson's survey was begun under the auspices of ex-President Henry Bowers.
