Science, Art Are Kindred, Not Opposite

Science and art, far from being opposite and alien to each other, "are cognate and kindred, in method and in essence."

This is the conclusion of Dr. Archibald Henderson, widely known mathematician and long-time head of the Mathematics Department in the University. He delivered the principal address at the 500th meeting of the Elisha Mitchell Scientific Society this week.

This conclusion, Dr. Henderson said, is the result of "50 years of study and reflection."

"The discoveries of natural science, the divinations of literature, the theories of philosophy, tend anew to establish an inescapable 'rapprochement' between art and science, and to recognize in the Creator both artist and scientist," he declared.

Dr. Henderson quoted passages, from Aristotle to Einstein, in support of his thesis. Furthermore, to illustrate the close kinship of science and art, he cited such historical figures who were eminent in both fields as Goethe, Poe, Echegaray, Schnitzler, McNinch or Earl Daniel.

Lewis Carroll, S. F. B. and Marston Morse, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Osler, H. G. Wells, W. B. Smith, Einstein, Eddington, Jeans, Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin.

The occasion of the 500th meeting of the famed Elisha Mitchell Scientific Society at the University was marked by a dinner party especially for Dr. Henderson and members preceding the address given in Phillips Hall. Dr. Henderson was presented by Dr. Paul E. Shearin, head of the Physics Department, president of the society this year. Dr. Wayne A. Bowers of the Physics Department is secretary-treasurer.

Dr. Henderson called attention to some of the scientific achievements of men associated with the Society, the first being Elisha Mitchell, an eminent geologist for whom the organization was named, who lost his life while engaged in research on Mount Mitchell.

Dr. Henderson expressed an "unpayable debt of gratitude for the stimulating influence of this Society for the past 69 years in the promotion of research."
