On Campus; Frats Take Action On Parking

The majority of UNC department heads approved the recently revised class cut system, but also included a few modifications. According to a Daily Tar Heel survey, 10 of 19 department representatives questioned on the subject were found to favor the revision.

But Juniors and Seniors are warned to keep that average up if they want to make full use of the revised cut system. All students taking upper college courses must maintain a "C" average this semester if they are to be allowed more than three un-excused cuts per class during the spring semester.

Freshmen and Sophomores are still subject to the old three-cut rule.

The subject of parking problems still remains a dominant one in campus conversation. But a few groups are providing a little action to mix with the talk.

At least three fraternities affected by the Columbia St. parking restriction have taken some action to alleviate their parking problems.

A 40-car parking lot has been constructed by Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity directly behind its house. A vacant lot beside the Beta Theta Pi house has been modified for additional parking for the fraternity's members. And Sigma Nu has taken "planning action" concerning the parking situation.

Caroline campus talent came to the fore last week when joint sponsors YM-YWGA and Graham Memorin Activities Board presented the Carolina Cavalcade of Talent Thursday night.

Eugene O'Neill's drama of a New England family, "Desire Under the Elms," will play through Tuesday night. Foster Fitz-Simons, Jo Jurgensen, and Al Gordon are featured in the starring roles.

This last full week before the holidays held a lot for the UNC campus. In addition to pre-vacation quizzes, students managed to get in some Christmas shopping, ride negotiation, and even some holiday parties. A good week to close out the 1956 season.

Tar Heels Report On Revolt In Hungary

GOETTINGEN LETTER:

Russians Deported Hungarians, Say Rebel Refugee In Germany

Dan Southerland

I saw the four as I was walking along Weender Strasse after Professor Kayser's lecture on November 23rd. At first I thought they might be Italians with their black hair and dark faces. They were all wearing berets and shabby overcoats, laughing and chattering with one an-

As I walked by, one tapped me on the shoulder and said "Bank,

They followed me to the Norddeutsche Bank of Goettingen. I asked them if they were "Ungarn." With what little German they knew they told me they were from Budapest. They spoke of "Russki, grenades and Pan-

Then they showed me the Hungarian "Forint" which they were going to change into German Marks and went smiling into the bank. I learned later that they would have received nothing for

These were the first refugees I saw in Goettingen. Since that time many more have come through Goettingen from the refugee reception camp located only ten miles away on the East Zone border.

One of the ten refugees who have enrolled as students at Goettingen University, Richard Bartha, is now living in our international student home, the

One evening when we were visiting a student fraternity, Richard talked of some of his experiences during the fighting in Budapest.

He told of using a sub-machine gun in the street fighting in which 25,000 people lost their lives. Bottles filled with gasoline were an effective weapon against huge Russian tanks. But he had to be careful not to get his hand blown off as he ignited the rag in the neck of the bottle and hurled it, hoping that the fire would get to the tank's mot-

He and other students held out for two weeks in some university buildings. At night, because they knew the back streets of Budapest better than the Russians, they could sneak out and get food and supplies. He laughed as he told the humorous side of his story. They got some plates from a tavern and lined them up in the street; then they threw sand over the plates. Soviet tank drivers cautiously withdrew in order not to run over what they thought were mines in the street. Another time, they threw up a rock barricade with an old stove pipe sticking out like the barrel of a gun. The Russians pumped shells at it for half an hour, although not one rebel was in the vicinity.

The fraternity boys listened

After the fighting had died out, and Russian police began deporting young revolutionists in railroad ears, Richard said goodbye to his mother and left Budapest. Since then he has heard

State Economic Outlook Good

North Carolina is another week older and deeper in debt. W. E. Easterling, executive secretary of the Local Government Commission released figures which show that as of last June 30, North Carolina's counties, cities, towns and special districts had a record total indebtedness of $423,280,926. This is more than 45 million above the debt figure on June

Easterling pointed out that "you must consider that the State's resources are at an alltime high." He described the over-all debt picture for the fiscal year as being "good.",

The Dukes gathered in Durham last week to attend the centennial observance of the university's founder, James B. Duke

As a climax to the program. Duke Endowment surprised the university with gifts totaling $2.4 millions. Quite a Christmas present for the Dookies, nothing of her. Mail and telegraph contact with Hungary

You could sense the sincere sympathy the Germans had as they listened to Richard, I believe, they felt it much more than an American student could, perhaps because Hungary is a matter of hours away and the USA is on the other side of the Atlantic, and perhaps because the Germans had also experienced the horror of war in their homeland.

This is not to say that most German students would have founght alongside the Hungarians if given the chance. Some would have, perhaps, but most of them would see no reason for it. Would it really do any good? The idealism of the German student of 20 years ago is gone. He is now sick of war, pessimistic, and looking at things coldly, realistically.

But most German students would like to have been able to help more than they could. As one friend at the University in Muenster said in a recent letter. "During the tragical occurrences in Hungary, we have had the terrible feeling of wanting to do something, wanting to help, but can do nothing."-

What were the Goettingen students able to do besides sit and tensely listen to radio accounts of the slaughter?

On the evening of November 5, there was a mass student protest against the Russian aggression in Hungary. A group of professors grimly lead a "Schweige Marsch," silent procession, of students up the main street. The street was lined , with people. For more than an hour thousands of students marched silently by in a cold drizzly rain. Along the streets of 16th century timbered houses, candles blinked and flags hung from the windows. The crowd gathered at Albani Place where the Rector of the University and the president dents to give their support to Hungarian students and spoke against the brutality of the Soviet government.

Students gave their support by raising money and giving clothing. After classes they dropped money in collection boxes marked, "We won't forget you." They gave shoes, overcoats and all types of clothing to refugees coming in through the camp on the border.

On December 1, the University held a dance in the three rooms of a student mess hall similar to Lenoir, with a band in each room, in order to raise more money to help. The Union of Christian Democratic Students at Goettingen (the active followers of Adenauer's Party at the University) came out strongly against the dance saying it was not the right way to secure money. Despite much protest, eight-hundred people attended and made it a successful money-raising project.

For weeks, ministers preached on Hungary at the pulpit, and professors preached in the letture halls.

But still students had the feeling of being so close to the "Eisene Vorhang," the iron curtain, that they could hear the cries of dying Hungarians, but could do nothing.

There is, among a very few students, a slight resentment against America, because "The Voice of America" helped stir up the Hungarians, although America knew she couldn't risk starting World War III by supporting the revolution. Some say the Hungarians had definitely expected armed help from the West.

But in the United States lies Germany's only hope. The students I have talked with are disappointed with the English government and have an increased lack of respect for the French government after the aggression in Egypt.

A very few students see a dim future. One girl history student told me she knew that Russia would conquer Europe in a matter of weeks. It would come evetually whether in two or ten years. She wondered, will we get the full support of the U.S. But most German students are counting on the United States, their only hope and protection,

CHAIRMAN HOLMES ... experience in student politics

PERSONALITY OF THE WEEK:

SP Leader Jim Holmes Interested In Politics

Gary Nichols

James Houghton Holmes is Chairman of the Student Party here at Carolina. He is a Junior from Mount Airy and has been involved in politics since he was a freshman,

He attended his first meeting of the Student Party in his fresh man year and has been active ever since. He has also been in the Student Legislature for three years. Last fall he acted as Parliamentarian in this group. Holmes is a soft-spoken, ambitious politician. When questioned as to his interests, he replied that his main interest is politics, but he also is pretty much of a music lover, preferring Beethoven and Tchaikowsky to most composers. He likes to read-mainly Hi+ tory, political non-fiction, and philosophy. "Above all," said Holmes, "I like to talk." He is chairman of the Carolina Forum.

Holmes is a History major. He intends to go to grad school when he graduates and hopes to become an instructor, and later, a pro fessor. His biggest goal, however is to get into politics. In campus politics he has been the SP floorleader, a member of the Advisory Board, and, right now, Chairman of the SP. His plans for the SP are "to continue backing Bob Young. The things he has done will help put us across this spring." "Above all," Holmes said, "we're not just interested in winning an election. We're interested in getting something done in studen'

USSR's Treatment Of Hungary Is Shattering Communist Myths

Barry Farber

In The Greensboro Daily

Communism is on the ropes. Its myth has been shattered, its power is waning, its future looks bleak. Basic truths have caught up with it. It no longer takes a wild-eyed optimist to spot forces in motion on both sides of the Iron Curtain that starkley confirm what only a few anti - Communist fanatics would have dared claim a month

Whether Communism dies violently or by slow leprosy depends on the Russian leaders themselves and on whatever global policy the West adopts from now on. The free world is in position to win with or without war. The Cold War cards have all been reshuffled by herioc Hungarian hands. We hold most of the aces. If the Eisenhower administration plays our new hand skillfully, Soviet Russia may well go broke on its own

Hungary has spoken. We now know for sure that which formerly we only tried to believethat Communism as a way of life is a bankrupt fraud; it doesn't work, nobody likes it; it must command by brute force; and, its captives are ready to be crushed barehanded under Russian tank; to prove it.

Russia's bosses are desperate. They have reason to be. For every Hungarian who expectorated upon the trampled corpse of a Communist policeman, how many Poles, Czechs, Romanians, and even Russians themselves would relish the same opportunity?

A militant, unbending American policy at this time capitalizing on communism's agony could earn this nation history's everlasting thanks for engineering the most humane clean-up job of the epoch. America's attitude up to now has been, "Look, Russia. You've taken a third of the world and mistreated it. Please don't try to take any more."

There are compelling reasons for us to change this immediately to read, "America is morally at war with Soviet oppression in Russia and every other Red-ruled country" and back this up forcefully without fliching or fluctuating.

The great lesson America has left unlearned is that Russia has so much more to fear from war than we do. We gingerly dodge actions like helping Hungary or daring Russia to send one volunteer troop to Egypt for fear of "provoking" the Russians. We'd much rather be provoked ourselves. We behave like a tiger afraid of a hyena. That's exactly the proportion of our military advantage over Russia.

How would Russia meet an American exhibition of moral determination? General Gruenther, retiring commander of NATO. has described how the West can deliver running retaliation if attacked. We have all the means to annihilate Russia right on its borders. Soviet planes would have to fly across the top of the world and Canada to strike America, The air edge is ours.

Dissension is festering among top Kremlin leaders. Their satellites are waiting for a chance to run amuck. Hungary already has. The Moscow rulers would have a difficult time selling the Russian people on another war with screaming slogans, unless the war is purely in defense of the homeland. Russians are sick of war. They are also sick of slogans. In spite of their obedient silence they fear the power and envy the promise of the United States. Russians know other people have cars, turnpikes, sportswear, and deep freezers. They are beginning to wonder out loud why they don't have more of a chance to enjoy life, too.

The World Had A Busy Week
