arrive at their own honest principles and then to teach them that the test of the principal is in human action," he said.

This philosophy is carried through by a system of classes consisting of roundtable discussions with from 10-15 students, conferences which resemble oral quizzes and contracts which seem to replace term papers and examinations.

DONS
Instead of advisors, each student has a Don who discusses her personal problems and who helps her to use all her educational opportunities. Her Don also helps her pick out her courses.

"Registration does not mean listing on a form the courses freshmen are told to take. It means talking about expectations and hopes, attitudes and difficulties, about the student's idea of what her experience might be, the advisor's judgment about what she should do," describes the unusual manner of registration at Sarah Lawrence College in the handbook.

Students take three courses each year. This allows time for extensive research. Classes meet once a week. Students usually meet their teachers and Dons weekly also.

FIELD TRIPS
Field trips for the classes include taking advantage of the cultural aspects of nearby New York City.

It is interesting to note, with election time close on UNC's heels, that there is no campaigning at all for an office at Sarah Lawrence College. Each student is considered a candidate. A nomination committee visits each student, asking if they choose to run. In this manner, with no politicking, the final slate is drawn up.

Full reports are written on all who accept for the two top positions. In an all-student meeting, this slate is presented. At this time, any further nominations may be made and the full reports are read. The handbook states "There will be no discussion of candidates at the meeting."

The stress is on liberalism and individuality here. But when one student heard of UNC's Honor Council being able to recommend suspension of their peers she exclaimed, "Why, that's more progressive and revolutionary than we are."

EXTRACURRICULARS
Some of Sarah Lawrence College's most active extracurricular organizations are the campus newspaper, the Public Affairs Forum, which includes many committees, one of them being the NAACP and their student council.

Sometime during the year, each dorm is extended a special invitation to attend a Student Council meeting. The Council meets informally and discusses in detail any problem confronting the college. In the proposed college expansion, the Student Council is playing a vital part in reevaluating the existing rules governing the campus.

One interesting goal of the student body is hoping to bring to the campus a young married couple who can serve as counselors to the girls and who will be present at night on the campus. This governing body is aiding the administration in redefining the duties of the dean and is encouraging the administration to increase the personnel in this office.

The Sarah Lawrence College community is self-governing under the grant of powers made to it by the trustees. The Student Council is the representative group of the self-governing student body.

Istvan Laszlo Going To Vienna, Says NSA

Istvan Laszlo, the Hungarian refugee student who spoke here last November 29, recently left for Vienna, according to the National Student Assn. He will join his Hungarian colleagues there.

Laszlo visited UNC as part of a tour of colleges and universities sponsored by the NSA. He described many of the horrors of the Russian oppression of his country and told of his experiences during the recent Hungarian revolt.

The Canadian government recently indicated Laszlo can be admitted to Canada under their immigration quota.

The purpose of this meeting is to elect a chairman of Freshman Camp. All members of the planning committee will be counselors at Freshman Camp this summer. This meeting is very important and anyone at all interested should not miss it, according to Y President Gerry Mayo.

Dr. Cooper Ends Conference

A speech by Dr. Herbert K. Cooper, director of the Cleft Palate Clinic of Lancaster, Pa., ended the third annual Conference on Handicapped Children here Friday.

Several hundred people were attracted from Tarheel and neighboring states to the two-day conference held at Memorial Hospital. The School of Medicine was host to the conference.

Dr. Cooper spoke on "An Approach to Diagnosis and Treatment Planning for the Cleft Palate Patient."

"There are many specialties of medicine, dentistry and in education which have an interest in the physical restoration, habilitation or rehabilitation of the person with cleft lip and palate," stated Dr. Cooper.

Dr. Cooper went on to say, "Each, in his own field and with his own techniques, at some time has something to contribute if the end result of treatment is to be successful. We are living in an age where specialty training and practice is very acute. It is only natural, then, that one is likely to place more emphasis on his own specialty. This is one of the dilemmas caused by specialty practice today."
