Hathaway, incidentally, was playing his finest game of the season until late in the third quarter when he sustained a broken arm. It was a tough blow to the Tar Heels. Hathaway is an experienced quarterback who has been a great asset all season. And of course, it ruined Nelson Lowe's chances of having three years eligibility left after this season.

Tatum had to call on Lowe to have somebody to back up Cummings ball adopted this rule from the pros at the all-important quarterback slot. Lowe should see a good deal of who used it successfully last year. action from here out since he is no longer a holdout. Should anything happen to either of these two sphs, it will leave only holdout Jerry Amos and converted QB Ron Marquette. Marquette, however, is playing some fine ball at halfback for the Tar Heels.

Could Tar Heels Possibly Go To Bowl?

It's just a wild thought (and hope) right now, but what if Clemson should beat Duke Saturday then lose to Wake Forest the next Satur day and Carolina should also knock off the Blue Devils then finish the season with a win over Virginia?

If that were to happen, guess who'd probably represent the Atlantic Coast Conference in the Orange Bowl You're right, the Tar Heels.

Dake is currently in first place along with ineligible State in the ACC and victory over Clemson would virtually sew up the trip to Miami come New Year's Day. But if Clemson, which is tied with Carolina for second and third place, should upset the Blue Devils, it might cause a complete reshuffle in the ACC bowl plans. Our vote for the most disappointed team around Saturday would go to N. C. State. The Wolfpack evidently went into its game with William and Mary feeling it would be a breather. But little teams have a way of acquiring inspiration and smoting down the most powerful opponents. Such was the case in Raleigh Saturday.
