

Journalism School Moves Into Howell Hall

CATALOGUE—The cover of the UNC Record has been revised along with the entire inside of the catalogue. This is the upper half of the new cover, revised for the first time in 30 years. A facsimile of the Old Well is on the bottom half of the cover. The cover is tri-colored, in blue, black and white—quite a switch from the gray that has been used for years.

Completely Revised

NC Catalogue Out This Week

By JOE MEDLIN

More than 1,200 copies of the UNC Record, completely revised for the first time in 30 years, were distributed to faculty and administrative offices this week.

The revision is a result of more than a year's work by a special committee headed by Summer Session Director Dr. A. K. King.

The new blue and black cover was designed by Turck and Reinfield, Inc., of New York City.

The new edition is 66 pages smaller than the old editions, and is organized into six parts.

Part one is general information and deals with student life and citizenship.

The second part concerns admissions, expenses and scholastic eligibility. Part three is a description of the schools and colleges.

The fourth part gives descriptions of courses, and the fifth part deals with special services and organizations.

The final section includes a directory of the divisions of the University and their respective administrative officers. Also found in this section is a brief history of the University.

Dr. King said the revision committee's objective was to produce a catalogue useful to prospective students and their parents in getting a complete picture of UNC, to the faculty in advising students and to students in keeping up with the academic progress and in meeting their obligations as UNC students.

"I think Miss Porter Cowles, assistant director of the University Press, Mrs. Doris Fuller, editor of the UNC Record and Earl H. Hartsell, associate professor of English who did much of the rewriting have done an excellent job," Dr. King said. "The results of their work will be reflected in many issues of the University Catalogue in the future."

"As a reference tool, we think we have made the UNC Record more useful and as a historical document, we think it is more accurate," Dr. King said.

Over 17,000 copies of the General Catalogue are circulated each year.

Old Pharmacy Building Is Completely Renovated

By RON SHUMATE

Bynum Hall was deserted this week, except for the News Bureau and the UNC Press. The School of Journalism, after many years in the cramped confines of Bynum, moved into its spacious and brightly-lighted new home—Howell Hall.

The move was like reaching the "promised land" for Howell Hall had been promised to the J-School seven years ago.

Howell Formerly Chem Hall

By GINA HARDISON

When the School of Journalism moves into Howell Hall, it will become the third occupant of the 54-year-old building.

The recently-remodeled classroom building originally housed the chemistry department, but since 1925 had contained the School of Pharmacy.

The structure was built, according to a 1911 University catalogue, because the facilities of the chemistry department, then located in Person Hall, were far overcrowded—with 367 students crowded into space for a hundred—and because of "unsatisfactory ventilation in the laboratories."

Money for the building came when UNC President F. P. Venable presented plans for "a new chemistry laboratory" and appealed for funds from the State Legislature in 1905. The grant amounted to $50,000, although only $45,000 was used for the new building. This legislative appropriation was the first in the University's history to provide for a campus building.

The structure was completed in March of 1906, although the cornerstone bears the date 1904.

Constructed of "salt-and-pepper brick with black mortar," the original building measured 120'x68'x48', according to the 1911 catalogue, and contained a first and a second floor, as well as a "commodious basement."

Archibald Henderson, in his history of the campus, called the structure "architecturally in-harmonious with other college buildings."

The site of the building, which faces west and is located between New East and the Morehead Planetarium, assured "good water pressure for the laboratories," stated the 1911 catalogue.

Originally known as "Chemistry Hall," the building contained faculty offices, 10 laboratories of varying sizes, balance rooms, dark rooms, a mineral museum, a carpenter shop, and a stock room, which was equip-

And as soon as the School of Pharmacy left Howell, the Journalism School went to work immediately. Work was begun last year, and the building is all but completed now.

However, the official dedication ceremonies will not be held until October 21.

Dean Luxon came to UNC in December, 1953, and was promised at that time that whenever the University got a new Pharmacy building, that Journalism could have Howell Hall.

The Pharmacy School got its new building, and now Journalism has officially taken over Howell.

The renovation job was part of a Pharmacy-Journalism Package Deal, with $1,250,000 going for the new Pharmacy building. The two schools together got $220,000 for remodeling and equipment.

The Journalism School received $162,000 for remodeling, and used some $60,000 for equipment, which includes typewriters, photographic equipment and furniture.

"I've seen nearly all of the new journalism school buildings in the country," said Dean N. N. Luxon. "The one at the University of Oregon cost $600,000; the one at Texas cost about $780,000. But none of them compare to ours as far as equipment and facilities goes."

Howell has two news-writing laboratories with 20 typewriters in each of them. An advertising lab also has 20 typewriters and appropriate desk space for students.

Two other classrooms seat 20 and 60 students respectively.

There are also two reading rooms, one for 50 daily papers which seats about 30, and one for 100 weekly papers, which seats about 20.

On the second floor is a student lounge, where students may go between classes. Press Club meetings will also be held in this lounge, which contains sofas and lounge chairs.

In the basement are storage rooms, four film processing rooms and a large photo printing room.

Large non-journalism classes will meet in the auditorium, which seats 225. Among the classes that will be taught in the auditorium will be Dr. J. P. Harland's archeology course, and one world civilization class.

Also in the basement is a news editing lab, which contains a copy-editing table with 12
