UNC Chem Grad Goes To Furman

Thomas Ray Nanney, a native of Concord, N. C., and a resident of Columbia, will join the Furman University faculty in September as assistant professor of chemistry.

Nanney is a graduate of UNC with a B.S. degree in chemistry. He has attended the University of South Carolina and received his Ph.D. degree there this summer.

He was a chemist with the E. I. duPont Corp. for a year prior to his serving in the Counter-Intelligence Corps of the United States Army for two years. Nanney has taught for one year at the University of South Carolina.

ped with an elevator. A lecture hall, which projected from the rear of the building, seated 200 students and was "well-lighted by high arched windows," advised the catalogue.

The laboratories all had adjoining fume closets and were equipped with "pivoted windows" to provide adequate ventilation. The entire building was heated with hot water from the University system.

With the construction of Venable Hall in 1925 to house the chemistry department, Howell Hall passed into the hands of the School of Pharmacy, which remained the occupant until moving into its new building this year. Howell Hall contained 30 rooms and a floor space of 21,000 square feet after a $55,000 reconditioning job in 1925.

The building received its present name in honor of Dean Edward Vernon Howell, founder and first dean of the UNC School of Pharmacy.

typewriters. The building also has a research center, with cubicles for research assistants.

Acoustical ceilings are found throughout the building, along with fluorescent lighting.

In the main corridor are 36 locked display cases.

The shift to Howell is Journalism's second move in its history.

Its first official quarters were in New West in 1924, when it was called the Department of Journalism, and was under the directorship of Gerald W. Johnson.

The J-School had two rooms on the second floor of New West, in addition to Johnson's office. Directly above the two classrooms was a room where the wrestling squad held its workouts. Below the two rooms were the offices of the Daily Tar Heel, the Carolina Magazine and the Student Publication Union.

Only 17 students were enrolled for the two journalism courses, four of them being in the advanced class and the others in the elementary class. Five of the seventeen students were co-eds.

The first journalism course at the University was taught in 1922 under the direction of the English department.

In 1950 the Board of Trustees officially changed the name to the School of Journalism. The School was accredited by the American Council on Education for Journalism on April 30, 1953—some five years after Dean Luxon took over the reins.

Book Theft Brings Investigation

A rash of recent book thefts in Lenoir Hall has prompted the Student Government to assign Attorney General Frank Liggett to the problem.

Liggett said anyone who had had a book stolen should contact him or a member of his staff. The Book Exchange in Steel basement, the Intimate Bookshop and the Five Points Book Exchange in Durham should also be notified.

As a security measure to minimize thefts, Liggett said students should have their name in ink on the fly leaf and in at least one other place in all books. He also said books and other valuables should not be left in public places for extended lengths of time.

"Thieves know what they are doing," Liggett said, "and they would rather steal from a careless individual than an alert one."
